

...the welcome to Grant was tumultuous; that to Dewey most elaborate and states welcome to Roosevelt was with a dramatic expectancy found popular expression in the typical phrase: "The Elba."

Grant on his return was a possibility, but as even foredoomed to defeat. Admiral Bryan, prominent as his part had been before the people, had never been entrusted by them with executive responsibility.

Roosevelt had been something of all these things—statesman, and "soldier and sailor, too." Born in the East, he had made an especial friend of the West. His welcome brought men from all parts of the country. It was national.

The first zest of public curiosity having been satisfied, speculation now turns on what share Roosevelt will take in an acute political situation within his own party, of which he had already been advised abroad by old associates who had carried him tidings. But on that score, speculation must rest unsatisfied. The Colonel had positively declared his intentions by wireless the night before.

"I shall have nothing to say whatever in the immediate future about politics," and he kept his word.

Therefore, there was nothing in the only speech he made here that could be construed as applying specifically to this or that phase of immediate state or national issues.

"At this time," says the inspector's statement, "when officers of the De Forest company were secretly conniving to abandon it and leave the stockholders a mass of worthless securities, its stock had been forced to an alleged value of $12.50 a share, or $2.50 above par."

"Another item in the statement sent out to stockholders was patents and patent rights, $5,520,233. The affairs of the company were recently audited by a firm of licensed accountants, who placed the book value of all patents at $220,233."

"The officers of the company have sold to the public thousands of shares, claiming all the while that they were holding their own shares and putting the money received from the public into the plants of the company. One of the officers is believed to have cleaned up $5,000,000 and possibly $10,000,000 at prices ranging from $10 to $50."
