Value of Good Roads

"Our cities are growing faster than the country districts," B. F. Yoakum told Oklahoma farmers the other day, "because money is poured into them to make them grow. Our farming industry is not developing as it should because not enough money is expended for the farm life to enable it to keep pace with the town life."

Farmers constitute nearly a third of the country's population and farm products make up nearly a third of the country's commerce; but of the money that the country spends on public improvements what proportion goes directly to the bettering of the farm? Contrast the amount borrowed by cities for street improvements with the amount borrowed to improve country roads.

To make farm life more attractive by quoting from Mr. Wordsworth's appreciations of nature and by distributing domestic science literature, that shows how to nourish the hired man without pie, is an amiable and praiseworthy ambition; but the sordid fact is that making the farm more attractive is going to take money. Rural mail delivery, telephones and automobiles have added to the attractiveness of country life; and they have cost something, too. How would the city man enjoy an annual appropriation of $37 a mile for street improvements and a recommendation to read Wordsworth?

Good country roads will add more to the farm economically and socially than almost any other one thing. If a city were in like position it would, as a matter of course, borrow the money and make the improvements. Farmers are entitled to use about a third of the country's credit. Whatever amount of credit they use for intelligent road improvement will prove a good investment.—From the Saturday Evening Post.
