The County Boundary Board refused to change the boundary lines of District No. 95 as the county surveyor got the description wrong. The way he had it read the line would have almost annexed Shelburn and West Scio. It was intended to annex Ed Balschweid's land only. Mr. Balschweid's children are close to school here and would have to go a long distance to the other school. An effort will be made to have the surveyor run the line as intended when the Boundary Board will doubtless act favorably.

Daddy's Bedtime Story—

When Daddy Played
Halloween Ghost
For a Thief

The Thief Dashed Out of the Barn

"HALLOWEEN fun is all very well," said daddy, "but there is such a thing as having too much of it. When I was a boy we were not allowed to play tricks on our neighbors, but I'm afraid we sometimes were naughtier than we ought to have been."

"One Halloween I shall never forget. We boys rigged up a ghost to scare any one who happened to be coming along our road. For awhile we raced up and down the paths. Then one boy said: 'Suppose we go over to Uncle Abe's, and if there is any one outside we can have some fun. They will be sure to ask us in afterward and give us a fine treat.'"

"We, of course, sneaked up to Uncle Abe's fence very quietly."

"I think I see a light out there in the barn," whispered one of the boys.

"Uncle Abe is looking after the horses, I guess," some one answered.

Uncle Abe was noted for his love of horses. His Bessy and Bonabel were said to be two of the finest horses in the state and had taken prize after prize at county fairs.

"There, he's put the light out now. Sneak in," called one of my companions. I played ghost.

"The barn door was ajar, and I sneaked in very quietly, having gum boots on my feet. I could see some one standing over by the window near one of the horse's stalls. The man turned his head. 'W-r-r-r!' I groaned."

"Such a yell as the fellow gave. The boys peeping at the door hadn't time to get out of the way as he dashed out. Then we heard footsteps running as if from the house to the gate. The house door was flung open and Uncle Abe stood in the door calling, 'Who's there?' When he saw men running he hurried out to the barn."

"For the land's sake!" he cried when he spied us. Then he caught up a lantern and struck a match. "There's something queer about those men, boys. What were they doing in my barn at this hour?"

"Into the barn we all stalked and there were Bessy and Bonabel saddled and bridled. Bags had been tied on their feet so they would step softly. We had come just in time to keep those men from stealing Uncle Abe's horses."

And he turned to us and said:

"Boys, I never thought I should be so pleased to see a ghost!"

"Well, he called out the neighbors to hunt them, but the thieves had gone for good. He and Aunt Mary made a big fuss over us, and Uncle Abe took us home to make it all right with the folks. I guess, after all, we were a little scared to go alone."

"But I've always been careful about Halloween surprises since then."

The Sirens Sang Their Best For Ulysses

Daddy's Bedtime Story—

The Man Who Heard the Golden
Sirens Singing

"Do you believe in mermaids, daddy?" asked Evelyn. "Anabella Jones says there are lots of them at the seashore, but we never saw any."

"No, I can't say that I ever saw a mermaid. I don't just know any one that did, but I've heard a good deal about them. They are a sort of sea fairies, with long golden hair, which they comb with lovely gold combs. It is said that a queer thing about the mermaids is that, instead of having two little white feet to walk about on, they are, below the waist, nothing but fish. Mermaids live down in the bottom of the sea in palaces of coral and shells. They sing beautifully, so the story goes, and the sirens, who were a very famous family of mermaids, made a great deal of trouble for seamen, according to the old Greek poet Homer, who tells how his hero, Ulysses, managed to pass their famous island in safety and hear them sing."

"Ulysses had been off fighting in a war which kept him away from home for ten years, and after the war was over he took ship and began to sail back. So many wonderful things happened to him that the story of his voyage is one of the most interesting ever told. Ulysses had heard of the sirens and their beautiful music. He wished much to hear them sing. But no one ever had listened to the sirens and lived. Their songs were so bewitching that whoever heard them could not help jumping into the sea and trying to swim toward their island. Around their island the ocean was so wild that all were either drowned or eaten by the fierce monsters that swarmed in the sea."

"Ulysses was clever. He knew it would be a fine thing to be able to tell folks he had really heard the sirens sing. So when his ship came near the place where he had been told the sirens lived he asked his companions to fill their ears with wax and tie him to the mast."

"Remember," said Ulysses, "no matter what I may say or do, you are not to cut my ropes."

"The sirens were no doubt angry that no one paid them the usual compliment of drowning, for when they sang Ulysses did wildly beg his men to let him loose, but his faithful friends and seamen would not cut the ropes until safely beyond the mermaids' island. Ulysses loved to tell his friends in after years of the matchless music of the sirens, which he alone of all men living had been able to hear in safety."

"But, after all, I wouldn't put too much faith in stories of sirens or mermaids, for nowadays, at any rate, I'm pretty sure we don't have anything of that sort."

KINDNESS.

I wonder why it is we are not all kinder than we are. How easily it is done! How instantaneously it acts! How infallibly it is remembered!—Drummond.

More to Life Than "Grabbing."

A competence is usually the result of clear headedness, persistence and frugality—virtues in moderation, but vices when they develop toward narrow concentration and rapacity. A man may have a great power of acquisition and little that is amiable, blunting or in any way connected with the higher qualities of mind or heart. Collier's Weekly.

An Obvious Error.

She had written on the black-board the sentence, "The toast was drunk in silence," and turned to her class for them to discover the mistake.

Little Bennie Sheridan waved his hand frantically and, going to the board, scrawled the correction, "The toast was eaten in silence."—Metropolitan Magazine.
