OUR NATIONAL CAPITAL.

How Washington Compares With the Great Centers of Europe.

In a paper prepared for the National Geographical society Lord Bryce, former British ambassador to this country, considers Washington in comparison with the leading capitals of the world. After speaking a warm admiration for the ideal site of the city—a beautiful amphitheater between hills that are rich with woods—and declaring that the surroundings of the American capital yield only to Constantinople, with its Bosphorus, among the great capitals of the world for charm of setting, our friendly critic contrasts Washington with its rival cities abroad.

"Whereas nature was most lavish in the aristocracy with which it modeled the site for future Washington," he says, "Berlin stands in a sandy waste, perfectly flat, with here and there a swampy pond or lake, and washed by a sluggish stream. The German capital is stately. Its streets are broad. They are bordered by many noble buildings, but the environs never can be beautiful because of an ungracious nature. Petrograd, the great Russian capital, has but one beauty—that of its splendid river, Neva. Besides this stream, there is but a flat, often waterlogged, surrounding country, here and there dotted with stagnant pools and swamps, and stretching into an almost limitless distance, devoid of feature.

"The landscapes around Paris are agreeable, but have nothing at all striking, nothing nearly so fine in the lines of their scenery as the hills that inclose the valley in which Washington lies and no such charm of such a still wild forest as Washington affords. Nor is the Seine a stream which can be compared to our Potomac. So, too, is the scenery of London, Madrid and Vienna behind that of Washington.

"The Thames, the Wien and Madrid's thirsty little streamlet cannot begin to compare with the beauty of the broad Potomac. Chief among the advantages of these foreign capitals over Washington is their quality of being ancient, an old age which gives to them a certain number of picturesque buildings, crooked old streets, stately churches and spots hallowed by the names of famous men who were born there, died there or worked there. This advantage the American capital can hope to overcome with time."
