TEST OF A TOASTMASTER.

His Speech, Whether It Be Good or Bad, Should Be Very Brief.

To the average man an invitation to "make a few remarks" after dinner is at once a terror and a secret pride. To be asked to be the toastmaster at a big dinner is usually taken as recognition of wit and knowledge.

The toastmaster's speech should be very brief. If he is a good speaker himself a speech of any considerable length imposes unfair competition upon the real speakers, usually visiting guests, whom he is to introduce. If the toastmaster is a poor speaker he borrows the audience and the waiting guests as well. And in any event every minute occupied by the toastmaster is a robbery of the time of the real speakers of the evening, and an after dinner speaker may have a real message that needs delivery, and the long drawn introduction, with side lights and anecdotes, will really cheat the audience of something worth while.

The toastmaster has a task of courtesy—to prepare the diners for the man who is to speak, to tame and train the audience into a proper frame of mind and to turn it over to the speaker informed as to his identity, prejudiced in his favor a little perhaps, but certainly not in the reaction following a laugh raised by the toastmaster.—Boston Globe

His Mistake.

"Before we were married you told me that I should never want for anything."

"That shows how little I knew you then"—Detroit Free Press.

In the School of Politics.

"Define investigation, James," said the teacher.

"Huntin' up a lot of blame, ma'am, and pinin' it on somebody else."—Philadelphia Ledger

DO YOU WANT TO BUY Automobile

If so, we want you to examine the STUDEBAKER before you purchase

We have one of the 1915 models, now in our garage, placed there solely for the purpose of exhibition.

If you want a car and one which is up-to-date, in which the workmanship is first class in every particular and one which will give you complete satisfaction and at a moderate price, the STUDEBAKER is the car to buy. We will gladly show you and explain the good points of the car and, if you wish, give you a practical demonstration of its superiority.
