Attention, Ex-Service Men!

Disabled World War Veterans, who have failed to make application for government compensation should do so at the earliest possible moment. L. C. Joseph, Pacific Northwest manager of the United States Veterans Bureau urges. Laws governing activities of the bureau give the war veteran five years from discharge to file application for compensation. In a large number of instances this period expires during the late summer and fall months of this year, he stated.

Ex-service men suffering from ailments of 10 per cent or more, due to war service, are entitled to compensation ranging from $8 to $80, depending upon the degree of the disability. Additional allowances are made for dependents. Even though the war disability is slight at the present time, the war veteran should protect himself by making proper claim and proving service connection. With these steps taken, the claimant is entitled to the benefits offered after the five year period in case the injury or disability becomes aggravated to a compensable degree.

"Every war veteran of this district, which includes Washington, Oregon and Idaho, who believes that his illness or present disability is traceable to his service during the World War, should get in touch with the nearest Veterans' Bureau," urged Mr. Joseph. "A letter written to this Bureau will receive an immediate response instructing the ex-service man how to proceed in the prosecution of his claim."

The district office of the Bureau is located in Seattle and there are branch offices in Portland, Spokane and Boise. These offices handle, aside from the compensation feature, hospitalization of disabled veterans, medical treatment and their vocational rehabilitation.

Shortage of Officers

Continued shortage of officers in the navy has led officials of the Navy Department to make special efforts to increase the number of enlisted men for entrance to the Naval Academy and for graduation from there as officers, says Lieutenant Commander Daniel E. Barbey, naval recruiting representative for the Portland district.

The law authorizes the appointment annually of one hundred enlisted men to the Naval Academy and all Commanding Officers of Ships are being urged to form classes under competent instructors to prepare any applicants who have the necessary qualifications.
