the matinee performance of "The Covered Wagon." Although the show is over, the sketch of Mr. Powell could not be omitted, because of the brilliancy with which the name of Powell is emblazoned upon the annals of Linn county and the Willamette valley.

With his parents and seven brothers and sisters, A. T. Powell left Jackson county, Missouri in 1852, the ox train of pioneers was captained by Joab Powell, whose two older sons had preceded the rest of the family westward. A. T. Powell was then ten years old. He distinctly remembers how the pioneers waded the Platte river. They had little difficulty, he said, with the Indians, who were somewhat tractable at that time.

Neither did the Powells have any trouble with the Indians in the Willamette valley after they had settled on a donation land claim in the Forks of the Santiam country, for, Mr. Powell said, the Willamette Valley Indians always returned favor for favor, and if treated well would return that kind of treatment.

It was because the Willamette Valley Indians were treated well, Mr. Powell believes, that, when the Linn county pioneer families were left practically defenseless by the departure of all able bodied men to other Indian regions, those who were left behind were never molested. The Willamette Valley Indians could at any time have wiped out the pioneer families who were entirely at their mercy, Mr. Powell said.

A. T. Powell still lives on the original Powell donation land claim. He is now 82 years old, but his appearance belies his birth date and his health is perfect. The Powell farm is five miles southeast of Scio on Crabtree creek.
