Albany Physician Dies

Dr. J. P. Wallace, veteran physician of Albany passed away at his home in that city last Thursday following an illness of six months from hypochondriasis. He was 73 years of age, and had followed his profession for 41 years in Albany.

He was identified with many commercial enterprises in the city; was its mayor from 1906 until 1912, and it was during his administration that the first paving in Albany was laid. It was through his influence that the Albany General hospital was built. He gave to the hospital the equipment for the surgery, of which he enjoyed the use only one month before he was taken ill.

He is survived by his widow and one son, Dr. B. R. Wallace of Albany, and four brothers and two sisters.

Funeral services were held at the Baptist church Saturday afternoon, and burial was at the Masonic cemetery.

Round Up July 3-4

Once again the serenity of Stayton will be disturbed by the rattle of spurs, Indian war whoops and the rollicking ribaldry of hard riding cowboys and cowgirls when Everett Wilson, the well known horseman and rodeo expert, stages a round up and celebration at Stayton July 3-4.

Mr. Wilson has put over many successful round ups. Among the big features will be bucking contests, horse races, relay races, novelty races, bareback riding, bucking mules and steers, and a dozen other thrillers, all of which are guaranteed to keep the crowds tense with excitement.

Dancing both evenings, big carnival, rides and concession stands, etc. Although an unusually heavy attendance is expected, preparations are being made to accommodate all.

Three Win prizes

Mary Conn of Lakeview, Ore., is the winner of the first prize in the annual Botsford-Constantine contest in advertising research and promotion for students in the course in advertising in the University of Oregon school of journalism. Miss Conn won $25 for her solution of a problem for the sale of a brand of catsup. Second prize of $15 went to Eunice Jonsrud of Boring, Ore., for the investigation of market conditions for the sale of a spring mattress. Wayne Leland of Salem won the third prize of $10 for his general presentation of a campaign for the sale of hats.

For her "excellent survey and presentation of Eugene market conditions" involving the sale of a brand of catsup, Sybil McKnight was awarded honorable mention.
