Over at Toledo is a concrete example of a few men who wanted to force on the community a citizenship the people would not have—Japanese. Peaceably the people asked the Spruce Co. not to bring in Japs. Antagonistically the company brot them in. The Japs were peaceably taken to Corvallis and their transportation paid to Portland. The slow action of county, state and national officials, who had been impeded to prevent the bringing in of the Japs forced the good people of Toledo and Lincoln county to act for themselves, and they did, without bloodshed. The people rightfully do not want their living standard brought to the level of a Jap.

HEALTH HABITS

When children are young, they are taught to walk, how to dress themselves, how to eat and to perform all the many activities which life and civilization demand of us. The various actions which they learn become habits and are performed without putting any special thought on them.

It is just the same with health habits. We don't want to be thinking continually about our health and the various dangers that surround it. If we did, the worry would be worse than the chance of disease. However, we do want to teach our children correct habits of health so that they become just as automatic and matter-of-fact as any other daily performance.

Instead of amusing ourselves by teaching children to be afraid of bogies, policemen, doctors and so forth, why not instill a little reasonable fear of playing with children who have contagious diseases? We already teach our youngsters to wash themselves; let's go a little further and teach them to do it before every meal. Or even further, and give them the habit of never putting their hands or anything else into their mouths unless they (the hands—and for that matter the mouth) are clean.

Children are taught to eat three regular meals a day. At the same time, they can be accustomed to making those meals of good, healthy food. A person who has formed the habit of eating wholesome food in childhood will find it a hard habit to break. The same applies to habits of sleeping with plenty of fresh air, of training the body to an evacuation of the bowels at a certain time daily, of drinking lots of clean water, brushing the teeth and all the other things that help to create health and help to keep out disease. The more habits of this sort we can form, the less we shall have to worry about.
