How the Notorious Bank-Wrecker Congples His Time at Sing Sing. Ferdinand Ward, perhaps the mosnoted prisoner of all, a curses sompound of shrewdness and weakness, unlimited cheek and with no conscience nor principles, achieved some rare rogueries in which he was not solely to plame. His vanity led him to take a leading part in it-the most prominent indeed-and, as it rolled on and on, like some enormous snowball, niways all directed toward tiding over each hour, not to arranging the final catastrophe, which was left to take care of itself. The amount of business done by Grant & Ward through the clearinghouse was $362,000,000, a figure repre-

It isn't work to speak of, it is not under the unrelaxing watchfulness in which other prisoners toil, but it is widely different from a seat in the directory of the Marine Bank or a desk in the private office of the once much envied, young and enterprising firm of Grant & Ward. The active partner wears stripes of coarse woolen fabric, but they fit him neatly. His boots are polished and shapely, and he looks pretty well groomed. Ward is not a man to suffer much in imprisonment. His fibre is not fine enough for that, his temperament is sanguine and his ambitions, unqualified by the character of their aims. gratify themselves in small struggles as readily as with great ones.

senting also about one-quarter of the national debt of the United States.

His life in prison has not been an easy one. He thought that money could secure him immunity from all its hardships, but if it could in any way soften the asperities of prison life it had to be applied with more tact than he brought to its application. Unfor-tunately for him, he expressed his views. The methods adopted to convince him of his error were prompt and stern, but it was some time before they were effective. At first he was put to work dragging ashes from under a boiler. It was hot, hard work, but he was kept to it for several weeks. Then the Bay State Shoe Company secured his services as book-keeper one Monday and found him ridiculously incompetent on Tuesday. In youth he had been an amateur journalist, and had some idea of setting type, and this fact has di-rected the current of his life in prison. The firm of Perry & Co., stove makers, enjoyed a large contract at that time, great Shan race, though less numerous and had need of blanks, bill-heads and n Burmah than the Burmese themlabels. They set Ward to work treading the press with which these were peninsula. The Siamese are Shan, as are struck off. When Perry & Co. were the peoples to the north of them, legislated out of their position as contractors, Ward and his printing office became an appendage of the prison. He can do all the work required of him the Shan character seems to prevent in an hour each day. The rest of his time he spends in reading and in such idle ways as he can find diverting. Even the fact that he is the most no-Shans of Burmah and the Laos States torious prisoner in the community of 1,500 rascals is a source of pride and satisfaction to him, and he courts the curious regard which visitors so readily grant him, and basks in the observation of the crowds which flock into

> The fact that most of the publications relating to his life in prison have been far from complimentary serves perhaps to check his enjoyment of them, but not to destroy his pleasure in the fact that he is still before the public. His inordinate vanity is beyond shame, and, selfish and envious, he has easily become the most unpopular man in prison, not only among the convicts, but with the keepers, who regard him as an unmitigated nuisance and do not fail to let him know it. Still, there are good qualities about Ward. He accepte his snubs-and there are many bestowe -with unvarying good nature. He is chipper and good-tempered under all conditions and has no apprehensions for the future. He still has matters in litigation, and Bourke Cockran, his counsel, is a frequent visitor. His wife has considerable property, a house in Stamford and a hotel splendidly furnished on the Connecticut river, between Hartford and Saybrook. This hotel, although a small one, is a very luxurious affair, filled with hard wood throughout and all sorts of luxuries not to be found in the average summer establishment. - Cor. Philadelphia

Good Portable Fence

I have a nice portable fence that I think beats any I have seen described in any paper yet. The panels can be of any length wished. I make mine mostly fourteen feet. I use five boards are divided in Japan into twelve five inches wide, three-quarters to seven-eighths of an inch thick, and make the panels four feet high. The light. The day being calculated from end pieces (for end of panels) are four inches wide, nailed close for the end and one in the middle. For the support I use two by three inch stuff, sawed, and nail on a piece for the cutout on bottom of board, just back of the upright. I generally split out my timber for bottom pieces, cutting the log to the right length-four feet six inches -and splitting out three by five inches. then cut out the place for bottom panel to rest in, two inches square.
