

TEACHING GOOD MANNERS.

The Most Hopeless Task Which Mortal Man Can Undertake.

But fine manners no code can teach. If they are conscious they become artificial, and are fine no longer. A man indeed may be taught to avoid grossness and impudence, and not to mistake them for ease. The youth who puffs a cigarette when he is walking with a lady, who is free and easy instead of scrupulously courteous in his address and tone, may be told that he is merely ungenteel; but if he chooses he may correct his behavior; certainly he would correct it if the lady showed him that she required the correction. The impudence of young men generally reflects the weakness of young women. If they required courtesy there would be little insolent freedom of behavior upon the part of their cavaliers.

What may be learned in the cultivation of good manners must be acquired in the school of experience. It is, of course, a superficial and external knowledge which is so acquired, and its extent depends upon the power of accurate observation. Is it not Goethe's Connoisseur who asks to see the best pictures? But what determines the best? Is it the state of the owner, or their degree and kind of reputation? The manners which strike Daisy Miller as fine, and which she will emulate, are not those which would attract another. The manual, indeed, is the result of observation. It is a lesson drawn from experience, and its value depends, therefore, upon the fact that it is drawn by Daisy Miller or by another. The better rule is the more general one—not to think always how you are behaving, but always so cultivate that kindness of feeling, that generous sympathy and friendly understanding, which will unconsciously regulate behavior.

The lovely lady of whom we were speaking, whose sweet smile and good-morning children crossed the street to see and hear, had studied no manual, but was taught by her own kind heart. Had she been cold, selfish, haughty, supercilious, her manner, however dazzling, would have been icy. The manual will do no harm if you use it to correct obvious faults of behavior. But good manners spring from a good heart. They may be imitated, indeed. The manners of Aaron Burr were called fascinating. But they were chromo manners, the ingenious mimicry of deep and tender color. Gilding and plating there will always be. But we must remember that gold and silver are still the only precious metals.—George W. Curtis, in Harper's Magazine.

COUNTRY HOMES.

A Contrast in Rural Family Life That Is Noticeable Everywhere.

It has been my privilege to visit a great many rural homes. In some it seems no wonder that children grow up tired of the humdrum; for from morning till night the same routine prevailed day after day. They must do this and do that, and if a little tardy there was scolding, and when they did as directed there was never so much as a "thank you." Often I grieved for many a boy and girl just nearing manhood or womanhood, knowing that their hearts and minds were starved. See them come into the setting-room at evening-time, after the day's work on the farm, or in the kitchen, and see them sit down so weary and spiritless, with nothing to interest them—no nice books or papers; no innocent games to quicken thought; no confidential talk with father or mother, perchance about some farm product which was to be raised or sold; no bright rooms to make home attractive. It was work, work, with no thought beyond "saving money"; the parents seemed to care only for what the children could help them "make"; and no part of the proceeds, however small, was given to the children, to encourage them to work, or to buy something which would gladden their lives.

Other homes were almost ideal. Bright rooms; books and papers; intelligent conversation; a general air of refinement; loving words between parents and children; perfect trust of the entire family. For each act, however trivial, the kind "thank you" was given, and a request was accompanied with an "if you please." No harsh words, hardening the temper of the young; and the day's toil was pleasure because the labor was appreciated. The heads of such families are rewarded by their children's love for them and of home, and there will be no need, or desire, to go to the homes of others, or to the streets for amusement; they will prefer their own homes. Most children have taste for the beautiful; give them some thing of beauty for their own—a picture, a book, an animal to pet, or whatever they incline to, and then witness the pleasure it will bring to them. Encourage the children in all that tends to ennoble; and in old age you can look upon sons and daughters refined, intelligent and a blessing.—Alice, in N. Y. Tribune.

—Jones (to barber): "Why don't you imitate your shears?" Barber:—"How's that?" Jones:—"They shut up to do efficient work."

—When a man wants to find fault he will do so even if he has to stay up all night looking for it.—Richmond Recorder.

—There is a good deal of difference between the scum and the upper crust, though both are at the top.—Boston Courier.
