PORTLAND

The Bulletin published by this Board have been washed and sprayed adapted for summer use, when the trees are in leaf. At such times care is necessary that the strength of the wash shall not be such as will injure the foliage or tender, growing branches, therefore the washes are not as satisfactory as they would be if stronger washes could be used. Now that the season has arrived when the trees have dropped their foliage, leaving them in a dormant state and free from anything that will interfere in reaching the parts where the eggs, or larvae, of the insects are deposited, and when a much stronger wash can be used without fear of injury to the trees the Board would advise this as the opportune time when a vigorous and thorough warfare be engaged in by all who have fruit trees for extermination, so far as possible, of the eggs and larvae that have been deposited upon the bark and in the crevices of the trees during these latter weeks, when most of the obnoxious insects have been busily engaged in depositing their eggs and larvae for another season's crop, believing, as we do, that more can be accomplished by one good, thorough spraying of the trees during the next sixty days than can be done by five times that number of sprayings after the foliage has appeared upon the trees.

WINTER WASH.

Among the many washes used for this season of the year, the following is recommended as being cheap, simple, easily procured and effective, not only for the removal of eggs and larvae of insects, but the accumulated moss, a parasite to the tree, which should be removed:

Take one pound of American or Babbitt's concentrated lye and dissolve in two and one-half gallons of water. This strength of wash should not be used after the buds have commenced to swell. If wanted for use after the foliage has started the strength should be reduced, by using twice the amount of water; making one pound of lye to five gallons of water. In using these lye washes the hands should be protected, otherwise disagreeable sores may be the result.

The board would call upon every citizen loyal to the great fruit interests of Oregon to aid in every possible manner in the destruction of these enemies of the fruit and tree, which have secured so strong a hold in many of our orchards, and keep them from spreading into parts of the state not as yet infested by them. This spreading is done largely through the medium of the apple box, fruit trees, scions, etc., shipped in from parts now affected. Every box, sack, storehouse or cellar in which wormy apples or pears have been stored or shipped, is the home of the larvae of the codlin moth, and which, if not destroyed by the thorough use of hot water, or some other means, will come forth in the early spring months fully prepared to propagate its kind in untold numbers in the first apple or pear orchard that comes in its way. Likewise, the trees shipped from many of the nurseries are impregnated with the eggs of the green and woolly aphid; therefore all fruit trees, grafts, scions, cuttings, etc., should be disinfected, by immersing for a few minutes in a hot solution composed of one pound of whale soap to one gallon of water.

The Board desires to call the attention of every fruit grower in Oregon to the two bulletins already issued by them, and if any have not received them the by addressing the secretary or any one of the commissioners.

By order of the Board,
J. R. CARDWELL,
President.

Harvey W. Scott was once asked

There can be no success in any business, least of all a newspaper, except it receives unceasing attention.

There is no resting place in the life of a town. Not only must it hold what gets, but it must always be getting.
Admitting that our town can be sustained with its present business, it will be necessary to increase the business to secure its future growth; and to do this it is necessary to either add a greater producing population surrounding it or
to build manufactories.
