manufactory of human character is of infinite moment to more souls than one. A stumble in early life may subject your posterity to the toturing trample of many generations. Men sometimes find it convenient to use as a foot-bridge some fallen trunk, or ride to glory on the back of some hapless brother's misfortune. Two-thirds of our race are saddled and bridled for the other one-third to mount and ride. A large percentage of our population are nothing but macadam for the velvet slipper and the iron heel. Mediocrity and servile obedience are used by the ambitious as bridge timber to fill up the inequalities on the great highway to the throne. Avaricious men stand upon the prostrated forms of unfortunate competitors that they may over-reach a brother short of stature and smatch the prize, ere the ragged and the hungry can stretch forth the wasted and with-
