Women's World.

What an appetite he has! How hungry he is always! How the cookies vanish and the ginger-bread disappears before he determines to eat it.

He is all noise and impulse, and warts, and freckles! His hands are dirty—his finger-nails rimmed with black; he has stuck a "rod of gum" to the wall in the pantry to clear the way for the edibles, and his trousers are torn at many knees, and he smells of fish-bait and peppermint candy; but he is your boy, and you love him.

The house is turned upside down immediately. He wants a string for his kite. He wants some lead. He wants a bigger fish-hook. He wants his ball mended. He wants money for Jim, to pay him the boot on the jack-knife he has swapped. He wants to go fishing with Tom and Jack.

He crams his mouth full of bread and butter, and with the jelly running out of his corners, he makes his wail known. "Ma, can't I have a bicycle? I want one. Where's pa? Who's been here with a carriage? Who's my box of worms? I wish I had a pistol, or a shotgun. Jim's got one. Say, ma, teacher says I've been doing pretty well. I wish I was a circus, or a millionaire! Wouldn't I have jolly old times! Going to school is awful. They think he's got the hydrophobia. It was in the leg, and he had two white ears and a white tail, and he'd sit up like a cat. I wish I had a dog. Say, ma, ain't there any custard? Tom has mice pie like that year round at his house. Oh, say, ma, can't I have three chickens? My mother's cat has got five, and they'll give me three! Mike said so! I wish I was a circus, or a millionaire! Wouldn't I have jolly old times! Going to school is awful. They think he's got the hydrophobia. It was in the leg, and he had two white ears and a white tail, and he'd sit up like a cat. I wish I had a dog. Say, ma, ain't there any custard? Tom has mice pie like that year round at his house. Oh, say, ma, can't I have three chickens? My mother's cat has got five, and they'll give me three! Mike said so!

Where's my line? Don't let Minnie eat up all the cake! I shall want her, when I get back! You won't let her, will you? And with a whoop and a burrah, he dashes out of the house, and leaves a track of mud behind him, and a clear, empty room for you to clear up.

But you do not mind it. You go about it maybe with a sigh, but at least, he would be to anyone else—not to you. He is your boy—your boy! He is your boy, and who is to be the prop and stay of your old age.

You look at him as he scampers off along with the other boys. Tanned and torn, noisy and boisterous, his cap on askew, his shoes untied—but still your boy.

How glad you are that he is yours! No boys like him! How you recall his good qualities, an all the good things he has done for you. How you are many—to retire into the background! It is true he pulls the cat's tail to hear her growl, and he likes to see her hiss at the boys. But you are many to the case him by saying that he is not cruel. It is only his age, and you long for him when he is gone, and you long for him to come back, and when he sneaks in about dark, with his feet soaking wet, and his face all bitten and scratched, and his hair scratched with briars, and two frogs and a small-sized mud turtle by way of trophies, you listen to his delightful story of his adventures, and you are many to the case him by saying that he is not cruel.
