He said he had found his wife in an altogether compromising position with an ex-representative of this county who is now a citizen of Harrisburg."

Roy Stuart, the invalid son of C. J. Stuart, the O. P. conductor, had a most miraculous escape from death last week. He is at Yaquina City, with his mother, and was down in the bay on an old scow playing in the water. He heard the report of a rifle on the hill above and soon after the bullet struck his boat. He raised up to see who was shooting, and as he did so turned his head to one side. That unconscious turn saved his life, for at that instant another bullet from a 38 Winchester, plowed through his hat, taking one side out and just grazing his hair. Several days before a cougar had been seen in that vicinity and the first impression the little fellow had was the shooters had mistaken him for that animal and were shooting at him. He was nearly frightened out of his wits and dropping his scow walked without it, the first time in many months, and made rapid tracks for home. It was afterwards learned that the shooters were firing for practice at a target, and Roy, unknown to them, was playing directly in range but several hundred yards away.
