A Terrible Experience.

We go to the Portland Telegram for the following extracts from a column article about some neighbors up the Santiam:

F. W. Hall, who resides at Mehama a small village of about 200 inhabitants, situated on the Santiam river about 30 miles east of Salem, came down to this city yesterday en route to San Francisco, taking the overland Friday evening. To a reporter Mr. Hall told the experience of three young men who resided near Mehama, which resulted in two deaths, and the other has only one chance out of many to live.

The young men, G. A. Hoeye, H. S. Powell and Gus Haines, all live on farms on Fox prairie. About ten days ago they started for Silver Creek falls on a deer hunting expedition. Near the falls lives an old bachelor named Wolf, who hunts, fishes and picks blackberries for a livelihood. It was at Wolf's house, or hut, the hunters first stopped, and after remaining over night they started out the next morning, laden with such provisions only as they needed on such expeditions, but as they expected to return to Wolf's place that night they left their blankets behind.

The ground was covered with snow to the depth of 20 inches, though high on the mountain sides it was much deeper, and about noon, when a blinding snow storm set in, the three hunters were completely at a loss to know in which direction to travel homeward. After making repeated efforts to reach Wolf's place they gave up in despair, and commenced walking about in a circle and slapping their hands against their bodies in a vain endeavor to keep warm. As the men did not return that night Wolf and a neighbor with some dogs started on a hunt for the men.

About noon, by the aid of the dogs, they came upon Hoeye and Powell, who told them that Haines had died during the previous night, while Powell's legs were so frightfully frozen that they were almost black. His hands and face were also badly frozen.

Hoeye's hands and feet likewise were frozen, but not so badly as Powell's, for the latter could not speak. Together the rescuers carried Powell down to Wolf's place, a distance of several miles, and then they returned for Hoeye, who was unable to walk. They did not reach the cabin until late that night, and they found Powell was dead. A doctor living about 12 miles away was sent for next morning and on making examination stated that amputation of Hoeye's feet and possibly his hands would be necessary. The suffering man was quieted by the use of opiates, and was then taken home in Fox valley. Haines' body was taken from the snow on the second day after the discovery of the men, and on the following day he and his comrade were buried.
