

PRINTER WILL

GO SOME TOO

The world is moving some, by jings, the price of meat—and other things—has gone so high by jumps and tilts a fellow has to walk on stilts to get within reach of meat or any other thing to eat. The Kaiser with his Zepp and Sub has raised a lot of hell with grub. We tremble at the price of spuds—The laundry man has raised on suds, the barber says the wartime air is making bristles of our hair which dulls his razor and his shears and does a lot of things that queers the barber game, increasing toil—and, too, the price of polecat oil has got so high these warscared days the barber says he has to raise the price on hair cut, singe and shave to save him from a pauper's grave. They've done away with all our booze and now the man who smokes and chews must add to every smoke and chew a lot of wartime revenue.

The slaughter house has moved to Mars the price of pork is in the stars, and the butcher stuff is prone to stray somewhere along the Milky Way, and I surmise that very soon that gink who stays up in the moon will take to wearing on his yops some very fancy mutton chops. The poultry, too, has hit the breeze and way up in the highest trees have found a roosting for their legs—and Mr. Man, the price of eggs have gone so high above the earth they're worth a lot more than they're worth. Wheat and corn and oats and rye have got Mount Baker skinned for high, and even now the new mown hay has taken wings and flew away and all that we can do is wish when we bethink ourselves of fish. The Sockeye almost failed to sock, and cod, the Linn and Kelp and Rock, are humping where the hump-back humps with prices going up by jumps.

A man today would have to steal to meet the upward price of veal, and it's as hard as saying prayers to get a mess of Belgian hares. The middle man has cornered yams, the law has gobbled up the clams, the ducks and geese come in by drabs, the submarines have killed the crabs. The Jersey cows, with coats of silk and a fortune for their milk and butterfat and cottage cheese—I never saw such times as these in all my life, though it's a crime, I'm going to raise the price of rhyme and prose and ads and little boasts to where I can be introduced to one good, square meal a day—puffs come higher anyway. We've stinted all that we can stint, the trust has raised the price of print, so in the high price days to come the printer he'll be going some.

The clothier's raised the price of clothes, the hosier's raised the price of hose, the "Panster's" raised the price of pants—it only takes a half a glance to see I'm patched from bow to stern, it's taking all that I can earn to furnish paper, press and ink, to print this sheet, and so I think that quite a squad of you old ginks who sponge the dope a printer thinks, never come through with a sou—it's wartime and it's up to you to drift in with a little wale—we need some more wind in our sail—we want to moisten throat and lips and sing some more about the ships we're building here to carry grub to fight the chap called Kaiser Bill. We'll heck that euss, you bet we will, and change his name to "Sissor-Bill." But while we sing another verse just please extract that trusty purse we need the money on the square, there's rheumatism in our hair.—Charly L. Gant in Guemes, (Wash.), Beachcomber.
