IN THE SMALL TOWN

A writer in the Philadelphia Evening Ledger laments the inefficiency of the small town public library. He accuses it of being a "center of culture." It ought, he tells us, to be a center of information. The farmer should resort to the public library for information about potato diseases, concrete watering troughs, fruit tree sprays. Women should find on its bulletin board all the latest news about canning. The library should keep a scrap book for useful and practical clippings. No matter how small the town may be its library should subscribe for at least one magazine in international politics. Above all else, the small town library should advertise itself.

The sum of these complaints seems to be that the library is too holy. It is a sacred and secluded place consecrated to the worship of culture in the form of novels. It ought to be a resort for the eager and busy public who care little about culture and much about life.

Here is a note which, we think, should be sounded again and again in every preachment on the failures of our rural institutions. The library is not the only one of them which withers up and goes to seed after a few short months of activity.

It is the same with the rural school, the rural church, the rural dramatic society. Some witches' curse seems to blight them. They never become "resorts" like the pool-room and the barber shop. Why not? We have laws aimed at making the school house a resort, or a "community center," as the learned put it.

But such laws do not work. The school house stands in solemn grandeur just as it did of yore, unvisited and unused. The boys do not play ball on its consecrated grounds during the summer vacation. The grange does not meet in its consecrated rooms. The public library must be kept in some other building.

Nor in the small town church a resort. Nor is the library. Our Philadelphia Jeremiah says they are all blighted with "culture," whatever that may signify. They wither; they pine; they rustle away in the life winds of gossip.

We are not disposed to blame "culture" for the sterility of rural institutions. We doubt whether the Philadelphia writer whom we have quoted could tell very easily what he meant by "culture." It is some fetish which he has set up to abuse without knowing what it is or where he got it. He seeks a lamentable effect which he would like to explain. The explanation lies too deep for him. So he takes a fling at "culture."

The sterility of the rural church, home school, the decay of rural life in general, are concerned with economics a great deal more than with any shadowy ghost like culture. The resources which should nourish the rural community are drained off into the cities because the cities offer the only chance there is for the average man and woman to earn a living under favorable conditions.

The mental ability, the spiritual vision which should stay in the small town to quicken its institutions desert their native home. Opportunity has gone to the city and they follow it. Who can blame them? So rural life is bereft of its inspiration—Oregon Journal.
