MERCHANT MUST DO HIS PART

In a trade-at-home movement the merchant must of necessity be the one who must take the first start. It is up to the local merchant to give the people of his community a good service. One that will cause the people of the community to think twice before going away from home to trade. If such a service is maintained there will be very little cause for the mail order houses to thrive from the business of that locality.

It is not meant by that that the dealer must always meet the lower price of the mail order houses. In many instances this is impossible. The larger buying power of the mail order houses cannot be duplicated by a merchant in a small town—who has only the people of a small community to draw from. But he can give a good service—be just and courteous and show by various ways that he appreciates the trade of his home people. His store can be kept clean and sanitary and attractive and made one that the people will enjoy coming into and patronizing—and he can keep his stock clean by closing out his odds and ends at the close of each season—thus insuring his customers that they are not getting a lot of junk that was put on the shelves of the store on its opening day.

These are but a few of the many things that can be done by the local dealer in the way of stopping the patronizing of the mail order houses.

Of course there are people who will continue to patronize the outside man in spite of everything the local people could do. But these people should be left to their own salvation. They have no public spirit—no community pride.

The trade-at-home movement is becoming nation wide in its scope and people are beginning to realize that co-operation is the salvation of all. And we should begin to apply it to ourselves.

What kind of a town would Heppner be if everybody sent away for everything they have to buy regardless of whether or not it can be bought at home? How long could any of us continue in business under such conditions? The grocer's stock would become mighty stale if the butcher, the baker, the blacksmith and the printer all sent to Portland for their groceries and the same is true of every member of every other craft, trade or profession—if all his neighbors refused to patronize him he would soon go into bankruptcy.

There is only one way to make a good town and that is for the people to stand by each other in a business way. Every business man, every professional man, every working man, every property owner in the community pays taxes to help support the community he lives in—to help make his town a better town. The millionaire owners of the bi-department stores pay not one farthing for the support of Heppner institutions. As loyal citizens of Heppner who should we spend our money with?

On this and other pages of the Herald will be found the advertisements of Heppner's leading business people in many varied lines. If you are a loyal Heppnerite, if you want to see Heppner prosper and become a better town than it has ever been patronize these people. They will give you a square deal and should adversity come they will help you over the hard places by extending credit as has been done in countless cases by Heppner merchants in the past. Will Rears & Sawback do as much? No matter how things are going with you it requires cash in advance to do business with them.
