STRATAGEM

By MILDRED WHITE.

Jack Trowbridge looked over the hedge and frowned. It was old Mrs. Brodie's fault he knew-this aloofness upon the part of his new and charming neighbor. She had been gracious when he had gone over soon after her ar rival, to return a kitten which had strayed into his garden. And so exactly did this young neighbor visualize the "lady of his dreams," that Juck had fallen in love at first sight. If he had been at all skeptical concerning this fact, time had proven him to be right.

The girl's piquant face constantly haunted him. His first morning glance was cast toward the casement window, and his last waking thought at night, was of her winsome self. The return of the kitten was followed by a generous bouquet from his garden.

"A bachelor's garden," he told her, informingly.

The girl was pleased. I'erbaps, she suggested, Mr. Trowbridge would be kind enough to instruct her in planting of a like garden; she wanted to live among a riot of flowers, "There was only herself and Martha—a sort of companion housekeeper," she added, and Jack went home full of blissful anticips

It would be a for to teach this lovely one the mysteries of gardening. a delightful excuse also to linger at her side and learn more of the character which attracted him; All the happiness of "dreams come true" was promised

Beautiful girls he had known, and worthy, but not one, who was not swiftly forgotten. The new neighbor with her wistful eyes alone refused to he erased from memory-white each and every thought of her brought a hopeful thrill.

The two had become friendly companions, laughing and chatting across the hedge which divided the old house from Jack's new bungalow, when Mrs. Brodie called upon the girl and drop ped her condemning remark. "Of course," she said, "Jack Trowbridge can't help but have a big head, when every girl who comes to this town makes a direct 'set' for him." The new neighbor flushed indignantly, at the implication. She, at least, determined to be beyond that suspicion. Hence the later coldness, which caused Jack's discomfiture. No studied advance, no courteous attention upon his part altered the aloofness of the girl's manner. His calls at her house were promptly discouraged-politely it is true, but dis-friendliness was gone. The beautiful dreams of a lifetime threatened to be but dreams, after all. Jack sayagely trampled the flowers in his garden as he strode to and fro. As a final excuse for a visit, he artfully captured the kitten as it came startled as he forced her gaze. "That fool Brodie woman !" he mut tered, as he retraced his steps, The next day when Jack returned from business in his car, he alighted with difficulty at the galoway. From thence, his little neighbor, watching through her porch vines, saw him totter unsteadily with the help of a crutch up his own garden path. His leg hung limp and one shee less foot was heavily swathed in band-Jack's cold-hearted neighbor looked for the evening light in the bungalow window, but none was forthcoming. Jack's housekeeper-so Mrs. Brodle told her-had gone home for a short vacation, Jack having made arrangements to stay in the city during her absence. It was evident that he had met with an accident, and had been obliged to come back unexpectedly to his empty home, Hours passed.

"Why," reflected the troubled head peering through opposite curtains, "did not fack use his telephone to call for assistance? Assuredly he had enfered the house, and associetly be must he there he deriences. Not a glimpus of light showed and the blinds were up. Nealected, the car still waited in the roudway. Could it be possible that he had fainted from pater?"

The now thereoughly anxious neighhor called Martin, and seat her across the garden to make inquiry. "Mr. Trowbridge is tying on a court," the nomun brought back information. "He mays he is suffering. but that there is nothing I can do." "What noncense!" the girl cried im-really here," he added pleadingly, and tourhed his heart. After moments of happy hewilderment, the girl lifted her head from hts shoulder. "Your pear foot-" she began, when Jack interrupted her with a kiss. "Oh! the foot's all right," he expinished culmiy. "Just used a little strategem, that's att."
