A public corporation,

(@ 1921, by McClure Semipaper Bill Curtis vigorously applied the old

stubby brush broom to his well-worn suit, then stopped for a moment to gaze out across the great green fields For 16 years, weather permitting, Bill had watched and loved this time of day, when the sun was casting its last slanting rays.

Tonight he was leaving the home h loved so well and the man who had shared his home and with whom he had worked for 16 years. That was the hard part of going. Something that looked suspiciously like tears welled up in his honest blue eyes, and he gazed for a minute at the man at the sink, doing up the suppor dishest As a rule this man was talkative, but tonight he was strangely sheat.

The arduous task of making an old suit look something like new was final-Jy completed and Bill stepped out on the little platform that served as a pinzza. He looked sndly at the two empty num chairs.

"At the end of two days' journes I will be with Marcin again." once more he could see the little whiteclad figure as he left her that last evening. Again he could hear the soft sobbing as she begged him not to be away long, and Bill held her close as he whispered:

"When I have made the little fortune I have dreamed of, then I will come back to you. And when I do come back, Marcia, it will be in lilac-time, just like it is today."

The first few weeks had been unbearable to Bill; then as the months and years passed he fell into that rut of being perfectly satisfied with working hard all day and spending OF OREGON: You and each of you are hereby notified that the above the long evenings with his faithful companion and his pipe.

"We've spent some very happy years here, old scout, but now I must be going back to Marcia. I wish you could see her, Jim--so small, with wavy tresses and-'

"Yes, but 16 years makes an awful difference, old man," Jim answered. "Yes, yes," Bill murmured, half absently; "in some people, but not Marcha." At last the time came when the comrades parted. Jim drove Bill over the two miles to the railroad station, and they silently pressed each other's hand, for neither could speak just then.

Jim drove back to the lonely cottage, seated himself in his arm chair beside the vacant one, and when the big full moon arose its beams fell on one lonely figure, and an empty chair.

In the meantime the train sped on towards Bill's old home and Marcia, His journey ended at noon two days inter, but as Bill felt terribly roman-
