FOREST NEWS

Gumane District A summary of the reports of Fred Casted, salter on the Five Mile cattle and horse range of the Umatilla national forest, during the past season, has been prepared by Range Woods. The summary shows 1,294 head of cattle and 44 head of horses grazed on this range and that they consumed 8,650 pounds of salt which would be 6.93 pounds per head during the five months' season. The summary shows that during June, the first month that the stock were on the forest range, they ate 2.62 pounds of salt a head. In July consumption of salt had dropped to 1.96 pounds a head. During August it was only 1.28 pounds a head, and during September 1.13 pounds a head sufficed, and it is probable, states the summary, that a much less amount would have been sufficient for the actual needs for the last month but the salter put out extra amounts to supply the stock through October. The services of the salter terminated September 30. The summary concludes: "It is, therefore, apparent that the need of salting is greatest when the stock first come upon the mountain range. At this time the forage is fresh and lacking in mineral substance. Salt partially supplies this mineral and, to some degree, tends to prevent washing, or scouring."

OUTBREAKS OF RABIES

SPREAD BY COYOTES The need for having experienced men ready to stamp out rabies whenever an outbreak appears, especially in the western states where stock raising is a major industry, and where the disease is rapidly spread from small beginnings by coyotes as well as dogs, has been demonstrated by serious conditions during the past year. Outbreaks occur more or less regularly, but by prompt inauguration of poisoning campaigns under the supervision of the biological survey, United States department of agriculture, to destroy coyotes in a wide zone surrounding the infected area, the danger to human life and live stock can be appreciably lessened. The past year witnessed the most serious outbreak of rabies that has occurred since 1915 and 1916, when the disease was spread by coyotes and dogs through Washington, Oregon, Idaho, northern California, Nevada and western Utah. This year the disease appeared in virulent form in seven counties in Washington, and was brought under control only after the adoption of the most vigorous measures by the bureau's predatory animal inspector in charge, co-operating with the state department of agriculture, the state and county health officers and the state agricultural college. Quarantine measures were rigidly enforced, and the entire force of hunters which it was possible to maintain was concentrated in this region to destroy infected animals and possible carriers. A 1,800 coyotes were taken in five counties. Sporadic outbreaks of rabies also occurred among the coyotes in Oregon, northern California, Nevada and Utah. The disease made its appearance among the dogs in Arizona and New Mexico, but its spread to coyotes was prevented by poisoning campaigns. Porter: "Dah next stop am yo' station, boss. Does yo' all wish to be brushed off?" Passenger: "No, thank you. Just call out the name. I'll get off in the regular manner."—Selected.

CHILDREN'S FARM HOME A WORTHY INSTITUTION

The Children's Farm Home is an enterprise mothered by the W. C. T. U. to provide in a group of cottages on a farm near Corvallis a home for homeless dependent children. The administration is placed in the hands of a board of 19 well known men and women of Oregon who serve without salary. The home is incorporated under the laws of Oregon with the proviso that if at any time it should fail to function under present management all property shall revert to the state to be used for the same purpose. The home is non-sectarian in character and will have a capacity for 220 children. The farm has been purchased on a contract the terms of which have already been met for many months in advance and the farm is now rented for cash sufficient to pay interest on unpaid balance, taxes and insurance with a balance in the treasury to meet cost of cottage now under construction. So far the home has been financed by voluntary subscriptions with a fund of $125,000 as the goal. Of this amount $50,000 has already been raised and the plan now is to raise the balance in units of $25,000. Portland is expected to contribute one unit and other sections of the state will also be asked to provide additional units and the legislature is being asked to provide the funds for one unit. The enterprise is a worthy one. There are many children in Oregon who need the advantages of such a home either being buffeted about or are inmates of the Reform School, which Judge Gatens, for years judge of the juvenile court at Portland, recently characterized in a public address in that city as a school for crime.

FARMER SOLVES COAL SHORTAGE PROBLEM

Washington, D. C., Jan. 25.—The story of how a farmer on the Pennsylvania railroad between Harrisburg, Pa., and Baltimore, Md., solved his coal supply problem, is going the rounds in congress today, doubly interesting because it concerns a prominent member of the house. The farmer was unable to obtain any coal, although he saw a hundred trainloads a day passing his house, situated in a curve in the line. Shivering, he watched the trains go by, and finally an idea struck him. He put up a huge sign which could be seen by all the passing trains, and on it painted: "Hurrah for Volstead." The result: Every passing trainman on the coal cars heaved a hunk of coal at the sign. To date the sign has netted eight and a half tons of coal.
