The Ghost of Doddington

By EDWARD LEVINE

(©, 1923, Western Newspaper Union.)

HORACE DODDINGTON passed out in the crisis of an attack of typhoid fever. One moment he was in the body and the next he was out of it. It was all as quick as a wink. One moment the doctor was saying: "Brandy, quick, nurse!" and the next Horace was looking at the queer little man stretched out upon the pillows of the sick-bed.

Doddington had been the owner of the largest chain of retail groceries in the world. Yet though an unkind fate prescribed the weighing out of sugar and tea, he had always longed for romance.

He had renovated an ancient manor house which was said to have an authentic ghost in it, but his wife and daughter ridiculed ghosts, and no one had ever seen it. Doddington himself had disbelieved in ghosts.

And now he had solved the problem for himself. He found himself accosted by a Norman baron in ghostly chain armor, carrying a huge battle-ax.

"Is that real?" Doddington stammered, touching it timidly and feeling how sharp it was.

"Read over here," answered the specter with a frightful frown. "Doddington, you are summoned for trial before the High Court of Royal and Ancient Ghosts."

Doddington never quite understood where he was taken, but it looked like a vault. He had only a misty vision of the court, but he could distinctly see the jury. It consisted, among others, of a lady ghost, who walked up and down in front of the box wringing her hands, a murdered child, a headless horseman, and a diabolical earl.

He discovered that he was accused of having committed less majestic crimes against the Union of Ghosts, in encouraging blackleg competition.

"Doddington," said the presiding judge, "you occupied a haunted manor, and, instead of relying upon the old, true and tried union labor, you admitted blackleg ghosts onto your property. What have you to say?"

"I did my best," said Doddington. "Did you have a ghost that walked from midnight till cockcrow in the good old-fashioned way, keeping strict union hours?"

"N—no," faltered Doddington. "Your ghost was reputed to have been seen in broad daylight."

"None of us ever believed in it," said Doddington.

The Norman baron sprang up bitterly. "He admits it," he cried. "Instead of employing ghosts that rattled chains along the moated grange, and uttered screams of a lost soul at midnight, he had a common, modern ghost and let it do as it liked. And he didn't believe in that even."

"What is your verdict, members of the jury?" asked the presiding judge.

"Guilty!" they roared unanimously.

"Doddington," said the judge, "you have been found guilty after a fair trial. Your sentence is that you shall become the ghost in your own home till such a time as you have succeeded in convincing your family of your reality."

"Mercy!" cried Doddington. "You will haunt your hall from midnight till cock-crow, acquiring the reputation of a ghost. You will be seen by visitors through the moonlight to the old well and to the top of the hill. When you are practised in your art you will attend a continuation school to perfect yourself in throwing dishes and rapping furniture. Now go!"

And instantly Doddington found himself back in the manor-house.

He was in a bedroom, and his wife sat reading in a corner under a dim light. The sight of her enjoying herself while he was a poor, helpless ghost, filled him with resentment. He thrust a bony hand forth across the page.

Mrs. Doddington went on reading right through the hand.

Doddington uttered a blood-curdling yell, but Mrs. Doddington took not the slightest notice of it.

Drawing forth ten yards of astral chain, Doddington clanked it.

Mrs. Doddington snored gently in response. She was asleep.

Doddington put all his force into the howl he uttered.

This time it got across. Mrs. Doddington sprang to her feet. A nurse rushed into the room. They ran to ward a bed. A man was lying in it; and suddenly Doddington found himself back in the body.

"He's coming too," cried Mrs. Doddington. "You pulled him round, nurse, after all."

Making Roquefort Cheese.

Fresh ewe's milk is used in making the famous Roquefort cheese in the town of that name in France. The ewe's milk is delivered daily and after being filtered and allowed to turn, is pressed into molds and sewn with the spores of a microscopic plant which assures its ripening or mellowing. After being drained the cheese is placed in natural cellars in the rocky hillside where it is left from 30 to 90 days.

Baby That's in Luck.

Mrs. Chatterton—Oh, Henry, what do you think? Little Richard is beginning to talk.

Her Husband—Good luck to him! It's more than I've been able to do in this house. How did he ever get the chance?

MAN'S VOICE IS PHENOMENAL

London Window Cleaner Able to Sing Two Notes of Music at the Same Time.

Strathie Mackay, a window cleaner, can sing two notes of music at the same time and has been the subject of much curiosity and interest in London recently. The department of phonetics in the London university has shown deep interest in Mackay's case and has subjected him to tests and at his own request has arranged for further tests of his remarkable talent.

One of the tests was made by Prof. Daniel Jones, head of the department of phonetics in the university. At the conclusion the professor told a newspaper representative that Mr. Mackay's voice was absolutely unlike any other he had ever heard. He said that it was phenomenal.

At the professor's request, Mackay sang a number of notes with the double voice, and records of these tones were taken by the kymograph, an instrument which shows sound vibrations. By these means it was possible to keep a strictly scientific measurement of the musical intervals between the double notes that were sung.

Professor Jones explains that Mackay apparently has the power when singing to make one of his vocal chords vibrate at half the rate of the other, or at a third, fourth or fifth of the rate. It is this which produces the double notes.

Light on the Subject.

I married a man some years younger than myself and did not want his people to know how old I was.

While visiting them last summer we passed a large dairy farm, with the year it was built printed upon it.

"Why, that barn was built the year I was born!" I exclaimed.

The look on sister-in-law's face was enough. Mr. husband laughed and added some more embarrassing moments. I'll never imagine myself clever at concealing things again.—Detroit Free Press.
