

AS OTHERS SEE US

it is to be had illicitly? Of young girls and boys sharing cocktails because of evidence all round them of open ignorance, rather than defiance of, some law or some Act that they do not understand; also the amount of liquor consumed inside otherwise temperate homes? Or can they deny the illustrating truth underlying the agony column advertisement of the Boston Transcript:

"Lady with bottle of gin wishes to meet gentleman with a bottle of vermouth; object, cocktails."

"The American Press reeks with the fumes of rum and whiskey. Columns of daily news of rum-runners, violation of the Act, arrests for drunkenness, assaults and robberies to open murders, reports of indictments for blackmail, 'graft' and dishonesty amongst public officials. This, and much more, finds appalling prominence in the press. The whiskey question lacks nothing in advertisement, and is kept startlingly before the public.

On the other hand, so much publicity has been given to the speeches of the advocates of prohibition that they have ignored all sense of justice and reasonableness for the sake of publicity. The average citizen entirely fails to see any great moral issue involved whether he takes a whiskey and soda or a glass of beer, or leaves it alone. The real objective and influence of temperance has been, and always will be, felt from the teachings by self-sacrificing Christian workers of the temperance societies and Incorporated Band of Hope Unions, and many other workers of all denominations striving to teach Christian temperance, and not to see their lofty ideals distorted and dragged through the mud and corruption of party politics.

"When the religious influences at work had achieved the abolition of the public house they had secured a victory that they might very well have been proud of; and as a signal victory it opened up vast possibilities for the further development of their influence. Part of the religious propaganda to close the public houses contained very elaborate plans for the opening of various reading rooms and places of recreation, under the auspices of the churches, where the working man could spend his evenings, the public house being closed to him. That idea died in its infancy, because the reformers at work never anticipated the small army of bootleggers that would supply the working man in his own home. To conquer the saloon was one thing, but to conquer the habits of the people who never frequented saloons was an entirely different undertaking.

"If the Angel Gabriel asked official Washington about the progress of Prohibition he would get a rude answer, but not so with the Prohibition party; they can 'bang the tins and bawl the hymns,' for, at the coming elections every candidate for office will needs walk carefully—if an avowed wet he offends the bootleg industry on one hand and the Prohibition party on the other, for the face and form of Prohibition has changed. No longer is apparent the small army of earnest Christian workers, the heart and soul of the movement. Bootlegging is now a very well controlled industry, steadily growing as large as the original liquor traffic, millions and millions of dollars have been sunk into it for graft and corruption in 'greasing' roads from the Canadian border, the coastal landing places, and in support of the carefully placed and highly expensive machinery in state and county officialdom, which must work swiftly and noiselessly to keep a stream of liquor steadily flowing through the United States. The American bootlegger is no longer the ex-bartender, he has become a powerful force, and at its worst heights the evils of liquor will be paltry in comparison to the political and financial influence of an organized bootleg industry.

"The Prohibition party have a very stiff fight on their hands, far stiffer than they dream of. To offer open warfare against a legalized industry engaged in legitimate commerce is one thing, but vastly different to reopen the war against the very camp followers of that industry that have battened on the defeated and grown viciously rich on the spoils, who cannot be identified by name or place of abode, and who have lived outside of the law, and the reach of it, and who have vast sums of money at their command.

"Temperance belongs to our cradles and nurseries, and our preparatory schools, and, above all, to our home influences. It is entirely a matter of education. It belongs to the teaching of the churches, it has no part in politics, but in individual training and moulding of the personal character."
