The first dandelion of the season is welcome because it is a harbinger of spring, but its fellows quickly wear out their welcome because they swarm over and ruin our lawns. One of the things difficult to understand is why some lawns are almost absolutely free from this pest, while others close by are drowned in a sea of dandelion seeds. The owner of the injured lawn works as hard as the happy possessor of the lawn free from the weed, but his efforts appear useless. To such unfortunate victims the national department of agriculture holds out hope of success.

Cut off the top of each dandelion plant and apply a thimbleful of salt to the root exposed. This will kill almost any dandelion. But sait, if generally applied, ruins soil, and so it must be placed only on top of the root of the dandelion. Cutting off the top without salting the root is labor lost, because the tap root grows down so deeply that cutting off the top encourages thicker growth from the root. The best time to do the work is before the weed has seeded. The spreading of the seeds from lawns in the vicinity is of such seriousness that cropping dandelion before it has seeded might fitly be made a subject of legal regulation in each pestered community.

Should the lawn be thickly covered with dandelions, thichen the stand of grass or start all over again. Thickening the grass crowds out the dandelion. Put the grass into vigorous condition in the autumn with fertilizer and reseed it where the grass is thin. Or plow the lawn up. or, if it be small, spade it and work in commercial fertilizer or manure that has rotted thoroughly. Fresh manure contains seeds of weeds ready to germinate. If the soil needs lime, especially when white clover is sown, use lime. Harrow the land or rake it frequently. Thorough cultivation destroys the seedlings and the dandelions. The lawn should be kept in good condition through careful mowing, rolling and watering. Spraying the dandelions with a solution of sulphate of iron is discountenanced by the department of agriculture, because the solution kills the grass beside the dandelion.

FRANK GILLIAM, County Treasurer.

Big rains all over the county this week. Surely a bumper crop is to be harvested, and the farmers are wear ing the smile that won't come off. Rains now, followed by cool weather is causing the grain to fill well, and fall sowing is practically made. On the other hand, the spring grain is receiving a boost that should cause it to mature into a full harvest at the proper time. Let us all rejoice and be happy.
