INTESTINAL INDIGESTION
The Commonest Form of Digestive Disturbances and How it is Brought About.
By Dr. R. R. Daniels.
Intestinal indigestion is the commonest form of indigestion. At the same time it is a painless form of indigestion. In stomach indigestion you will have pain; you may be doubled up with the colic. But if you have indigestion in the small intestine, it being an organ of low sensibility, you will have but little or no pain. Intestinal indigestion is caused by overeating on the foods which are digested in the small intestines; these are starchy foods of every kind, principally breads, potatoes and cereals. As the excess, unused starchy food fails to be digested it ferments and forms gases and other irritating substances in the small intestines. Thus gas in the bowels, usually with diarrhea or occasionally with constipation, sometimes with more or less distress and bloating of the abdomen, are the principal symptoms of intestinal indigestion. The remote symptom often more important than those occurring in the intestine itself. As the undigested starchy food ferments in the intestines, poisons are formed which are taken into the system, and have a deleterious effect upon many parts of the body. Nervousness and sleeplessness are the results of the effects of these poisons on the nervous system. A form of rheumatism, catarrh, too little weight, weakness, frequent colds, and many other disorders are the results in large part, of the constant poisoning of the system in intestinal indigestion. These symptoms are usually indications of this disorder.
Intestinal indigestion is to be cured by reducing the amount of bread, potatoes and starchy foods. Overeating on this class of food is the commonest form of overeating, consequently intestinal indigestion is the commonest form of indigestion. To insure proper digestion of the starchy foods, these foods should be well baked and they should be thoroughly masticated. Hard toast is easier digested than ordinary white bread; pancakes, waffles and pastries are practically indigestible, and they play an important part in causing intestinal indigestion.

A Farm Hand Came To Town.

A Farm Hand came to town one day He had traveled many miles. A very tired man was he that Walked down our streets, I'll say. But when on a corner he chanced to spy A bench all painted red, He lost not one moment But sat down with a smile. Around him other men were talking Of the things past And that were to come, And as the voices died away He was lost to pleasant dreams. He slept and dreamed, God Morpheus was host. The Farm Hand dreamed of famous men, Men whom the people laud; Then dreamed he was one of them, Appearing like a ghost. Finally he was awakened, By someone rudely shaken, "Get up" cried the captain with command; "The meeting is over and the Squad's adjourning, "Adjourning 'till another day, "Your name has been placed on the waiting list, "We will elect you if we may." —Contributed.
