Sheep Grazing in Wallowa National Forest.

NOT A SMALL PART of the work being done by the Forest Service of the United States Department of Agriculture is for the benefit of the stock industry. All of the national forests are conserved for grazing purposes where adapted and through care and improvement of the grazing lands the Government hopes to confer a lasting benefit upon the live stock industry.

In the past the Wallowa National Forest has been overstocked and overgrazed, but last season an appropriation of $10,500 was made for a reconnaissance study of the Wallowa Forest, with the result that the correct capacity of the range is being determined. Scientific management will then be possible.

The above photograph is of sheep grazing in a coyote-proof pasture in the Wallowa National Forest. The lambs, it may be interesting to note, are one-half Shropshire.
