Playground Movement Should Interest All.

Oregon Agricultural College, Corvallis, Feb. 16.—"If you wish the child to have the very best development you should be interested in the playground movement, for it develops the mental, the social, and the moral side of the child's nature. Just as much as it develops the physical side."

So said Miss Miriam Thayer, Professor of Physical Education for Women, Oregon Agricultural College, to the several hundred women and men whom she addressed during Farmers' Week. "The question of playgrounds is one for the business men's and the women's clubs, and whether you have little children or not, I think you should be interested in the playgrounds."

"We may divide the ages considered in connection with play into the following sections: Up to five, the imitative age; from five to 12—and this is a very important age in the development of a child—the age in which he begins to assert himself and where his individuality comes in; from this age up to about 20. Quite often children of this later age (for they are children) care nothing about play. This is because of our too highly developed civilization. Indeed play should not stop even at 20."
