COOKING CANNED PEAS

Food Specialists Devise Special Forms of Seasoning and Combinations With Other Vegetables.

In some cases trained cooks make especially fine dishes by combining vegetables and in others secure variety by some special form of seasoning. It is often possible (without undue labor) for the housewife to apply these methods to good of her everyday problems with good results.

Now that the girls' canning clubs in the different States are teaching their members to put up vegetables for winter use, there is a new demand for information regarding the best ways of using such products. The experts in the Office of Home Economics in the Department of Agriculture are trying to supply, and offer, among others, the following suggestions:

Everyone knows that the flavor of canned peas is seldom just like that of fresh ones, and so the housekeeper if she wishes takes unusual pains in seasoning and preparing them for the table.

Many persons consider that a slight onion flavor improves cooked vegetables, and indeed this flavoring is quite commonly used in soups from split peas or dried beans. It is equally good with canned peas, and may be easily introduced in the following manner: For a quart can of peas use a table-spoonful of chopped onion, which has been cooked in a little butter and water until tender. Add as much salt and pepper as desired. Heating the peas in the saucepan the onion was cooked in lessens the labor of dish washing that much—a simple application of the principle that a housekeeper should always try to plan her cooking in such a way that she "saves dishes" and so spares herself needless labor.

If there are on hand any of the coarser outer leaves, such as are usually discarded from a head of lettuce, they can be shredded and cooked with the onion and added to the peas. This use of lettuce and onion was suggested by a French method. In which the young and tender peas are placed on freshly washed lettuce leaves and cooked in a tightly covered saucepan without adding any water, a small spring onion being usually added to flavor the dish. Lettuce leaves must be very thoroughly washed before using the plants, especially the outer leaves, which are easily spattered with sand and dirt. A table-spoonful of chopped or shredded cooked ham may also be added with onion to flavor canned peas, and this is particularly desirable when lettuce is not available. Chopped celery leaves, which might otherwise be wasted, if cooked with peas in place of the lettuce leaves, will also serve to give a distinctive flavor.

In some parts of the world green peas are considered best when cooked with a sprig of spearmint. Though most families in the United States might agree that tender green peas, fresh from the garden, need no flavoring except salt, pepper, and perhaps a little butter, they may occasionally enjoy a little flavor of mint with the winter canned peas. When fresh mint is not available, the dried will answer almost as well. It can be obtained in shops, and anyone who has access to a mint patch can prepare it at home by spreading the leaves on a plate and drying them in a warm, but not hot, oven. In seasoning peas, use only a very small quantity of mint, one or two leaves or a small sprig.

Combinations of vegetables are palatable, and sometimes using two or three together is an economy, since there may not be on hand enough of either to serve the family. Carrots and peas, either fresh or canned, make a good and well-known combination, and here color, as well as flavor, plays a part. Carrots cooked and cut into pieces not much larger than the peas, may be combined with them in any convenient amount. Besides those stored for winter use, canned carrots may be used, and they may be canned successfully at home, as shown by the work of the girls' canning clubs.

Another combination which many relish is turnips with peas. The finely cut turnips may be mixed with the canned peas in the same way as carrots, or the peas, well seasoned with butter, salt and pepper, may be served in cups made of hollowed-out halves of small turnips, cooked in salted water until tender. The two vegetables can then be "combined at will," since the cup and contents are eaten together.

What Are YOU Worth From the NECK UP?

It is estimated that the average man is worth $2 a day from the neck down—what is he worth from the neck up?

That depends entirely upon training. If you are trained so that you plan and direct your work you are worth ten times as much as the man who can work only under orders.

The International Correspondence Schools go to the man who is struggling along on small pay and say to him, "We will train you for promotion—right where you are, or we will qualify you to take up a more congenial line of work at a much higher salary."

Every month several hundred students voluntarily report advancement as the direct result of I. C. S. training.
