pledged his securities. These bonds should be in denominations to make them available for all classes of investors. A bond of small denomination, bearing 4 per cent interest and having a face value of $25, would be seized upon by those having small earnings, but who desired to place small savings in safe securities. Such a bond would be liquid, and could be realized on at any moment. I believe such a bond would encourage the habit of thrift and would to that extent stabilize character. Bonds of other convenient denominations, say $100, $500, $1,000 and $10,000, should be offered, but it is safe to say the smaller bonds would find the greater demand.

In placing loans with the farmer, the state should exercise such care as would insure the security of the loan. Loans made on a basis of 50 per cent of appraised valuation should be regarded as conservative and safe. With amortization applied in the payment of the loan, the security would become better with each amortized payment. As an incident to making such loans, and as tending to equalize assessed values on farm lands, no loan should be made for a greater amount than the average assessed value for the three consecutive years preceding the loan. With such limitations and conservative supervision, the securities of the state should be as good as gold in the vaults of the treasury.

If this kind of a rural credit system is safe, if it will put new life into agricultural industry, if it will indirectly stimulate all the industries of the state, who is there who will oppose such a measure? Only those who half see and those whose sordid self interests prosper, through injustice and oppression.
