Spotted Beetle Injures Beans

Young bean plants just beginning to grow well are being attacked by a small, spotted beetle. This beetle is about the size and general appearance of a Lady Bird beetle, greenish-yellow in color with twelve black spots on the wing covers. They usually appear in considerable numbers and feed voraciously on the foliage, soon ragging the plant so thoroughly as to devitalize or even kill it. In addition to beans, practically all garden and truck crops are subject to injury by this beetle, particularly squash, cucumbers, corn and egg plant.

The usual recommendation of applying some poison to the foliage as practised for most leaf-chewing insect pests will not serve in the case of this beetle unless supplemented by what is known as the trap-crop system. A spray or dust applied to the plant acts as more or less of a repellent and it is somewhat difficult to get the beetle to feed on the treated foliage. Therefore in order to avoid their going down below ground and eating off the stems of the plants, it is advisable to leave a few plants here and there, known as a trap crop for the beetles to feed upon and treat the rest of the field. The most practical method is, in cases where beans are to constitute the main crop, to plant here and there through the bean field a few hills of squash. The beans should then be dusted with a powder consisting of sulphur 85 parts, powdered arsenate of lead 15 parts and the squash vines should be left untreated. The beetles will then collect on the untreated plants and may be killed by mechanical means here. Where no other crop is available, as a trap, a few hills of beans here and there through the field should be sacrificed to the cause and the others treated. Generally speaking, a dust application is preferable to a liquid spray, although the liquid arsenate of lead spray is also very effective in preventing injury by the beetles where a trap crop is present.—A. L. Lovett, Entomology Dept. O. A. C.

SEEKS FAR EAST MARKETS FOR U. S. FRUIT

Washington, D. C., June 6.—To help American fruit shippers obtain Pacific outlets for their products during the coming season, the Office of Markets and Rural Organization is sending a representative to China, Japan, Australia, the Philippines and Eastern Siberia to investigate the marketing of American fruit in these foreign countries, according to an announcement of the U. S. Department of Agriculture today.

The need of expanding the Pacific outlet is made evident by the closing, practically, of the English and Scandinavian markets to which the United States has previously forwarded large quantities of fruit, particularly apples and pears.

The representative, Anson Penfield Bateham, special investigator in foreign fruit markets, will sail from Vancouver June 7. The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, of the Department of Commerce, and the Consular Service, of the Department of State, will cooperate with the Office of Markets and Rural Organization in the investigation through the commercial attaches and the various consular officers in the countries to be visited.
