Minor Musings

The nominal head of the household, the man, is not half so often the dictator as some child of one to ten years. The man usually has the name among the neighbors, without any of the powers, a good deal like the kingship of the king of England.

About all the world's discord that is not caused by egotism is caused by mental inability to understand the viewpoint of others.

Some day it is going to be a penal offense to use the expression "old maid." The world's finest women characters have been unmarried women who have attained discreet years. There is no special merit in just being married any more than there is in being born or dying, and there may be a great deal of merit in not being married.

Don't look down upon the rich in these times of fluctuating fortunes you may be rich yourself, some day. The fact that lazy men are invariably good natured makes everybody about them ill-natured.

There is a certain preventative now for about everything except plain dampfoolishness.

Married men and these 45-55 year-old bachelors are going to wonder at the great change that has come over their young women friends after "the boys come home."

The reason the mother of a year-old baby understands perfectly what it says is because the baby doesn't and somebody has to.

The war ended in time to just about ruin the chances for glory of a lot of men who were getting ready to get into it, if you'll listen to their story.

The pessimist is one who while grudgingly admitting that the weather is pleasant, prophesies that "we'll make up for it later on."

A talkative barber is bound to make cutting remarks.

A girl who is a lily before marriage sometimes continues to be one afterwards—a tiger lily.

The only reason that publishers have for putting the pictures of girls' heads on the magazine covers is because the public seems to be more interested in girls than anything else.

The wife takes a certain kind of pride, delights to a certain extent in her martyrdom, when she has a good story is "hard to get along with," for she is always assured of the sympathy of other women whose husbands are the same way—which means about all other women and all other husbands.

None so blind as they whom prejudice has made sightless.

Do you fully realize that your little pet cult or belief is merely amusing or irritating to everybody else except you and your crowd? If you must have freak beliefs, keep them a secret and don't bore sensible people with them.

Probably the main trouble with people is that there are too many of them.

It takes a rare genius to be a good money saver and pauper at the same time.

When a man starts to fit up an office, the first thing he thinks of is a cuspidor, but a woman always gets a flower vase.

The reason nobody ever likes to pay taxes or a life insurance premium is because he can't see where the tax money goes and he resents the idea that he has to pay to keep himself alive when he puts up for the insurance premium.

We are all creatures of sin and some of us seem mighty proud of it.

While a boy is dreaming of the day when he'll either be a policeman and arrest somebody he doesn't like, or a cowboy and travel with a circus, the girl is dreaming of a home filled with servants.

A man usually gets pretty well along in years before he discovers that the man who rushes wildly about, bumping into people and always in a hurry is not the one who accomplishes the most in a day. Such a man thinks he's busy when he's only excited.

Many a tired mother of screaming, fighting children, wishes she might also enter a peace conference.

The hardest thing in the world is to try to appear interested when an acquaintance is telling you how much money he made last year, while you are trying to figure out where to raise the price of a new overcoat.

You may not like those you have to associate with, and the chances are the feeling is mutual.

If there is anything more foolish than a man in a dry-goods store trying to do his wife's shopping it is a bachelor trying to buy a Christmas present for a baby.

THE NEW HOME.

In these days when the foundation under a two-story house is of the thickness of a piece of restaurant pie, and when the nickel plate on the bathroom fittings wears about as long as the roofing, it is a pleasure to come across a pioneer house that was built when men had time to build homes for their great grandchildren.

You could take one of those old hand-hewn, lumber houses, pinned together with oak pins, and roll it over like a ball; it would suffer no more than the ball from the rolling. Eight and ten-inch timber for walls. Hewn from the live forest, and fitted to place with a cunning lost today.

Houses built as men built ships in olden days, and meant to endure as the old ships of teak and oak endured.

Houses in which the granite fireplaces showed decay first, with split cedar "shake" roofs that outlast iron.

Houses with puncheon floors on which the hobnail heels of six generations hardly left a scar.

A house that became part of the landscape, as fixed as the great oak before it, or the elm beside it, or the 200-year apple tree, that kept majestic watch beside it.

A house that cradled generations and as sturdily stood off the March tempests in 1900 as it did in 1700, and that gathered to the stout heart of it some of the warmth and graciousness and sturdy character of the young lovers, and the matronly wives, and the upstanding fathers that abode there.

A few of these old houses are left; without repair or paint they will, if left alone, outlast all the present generation of tinder and pasteboard houses, that have had their insides filled with three-score pretty knick knacks of plumbing, and lighting, and heating, and sanitation, and utility, and that admit winter wind and summer heat about as freely as the ancient skin tepee of the first Americans.

MAKES HIM HOMESICK.

"Shut that door!" yelled the rough man. "Where were you raised, in a barn?" The man addressed meekly and silently complied, but the speaker looking at him a moment later observed that he was in tears. Going over to his victim he apologized. "Oh, come," he said soothingly, "you shouldn't take it to heart because I asked if you were raised in a barn."

"That's it, that's it," sobbed the other man. "I was raised in a barn and it makes me homesick every time I hear an ass bray."

L. L. Van Winkle, who farms the Jas. Pointer place near Lexington, was in Heppner Saturday. His family is now fully recovered from a siege of influenza.
