Use Zero Cold Test Oils in Winter—Other Oils Endanger Motor.

"Unless you use a zero cold test oil in cold weather motoring," said Mr. George Milholland, Special Agent of the Standard Oil Company yesterday, "you might just as well have no lubricant in your car for the first fifteen to thirty minutes of operation, for congealed oil does not lubricate. "With the oil in the crankcase too thick or sluggish from the cold to splash properly, what must be the effect on cylinders and bearings during the half-hour or so required for the oil to regain its proper fluidity? Excessive wear, with grave danger of serious damage to the motor, to say nothing of the drain on the batteries in trying to get started. "To avoid this danger and annoyance, motorists should use Zerolene which is refined from California crude of the naphthene series. This oil has a natural zero cold test because there is no paraffine present to congeal at low temperatures.

When 1776 meets 1919 by Miss Dona McMillan and Miss Gladys Benge.

School Song.

The auditorium was well filled by parents and friends. Each number showed that great pains had been taken in preparation, and reflected the good work of the teachers in the behavior of the pupils and the pleasing manner in which each part was given.

The number entitled "When 1776 meets 1919" was especially appreciated by the audience. This play represented a young lady of colonial times stepping from her oil painting, and meeting her great-great-grandchild, an up-to-date young lady of society.

Their efforts at conversation was very amusing. The society slang of today being entirely beyond the comprehension of the colonial young lady. Miss Urton, their teacher received many compliments upon the setting arranged for this number, also for the costumes designed for the young ladies.

On Saturday evening a surprise party was arranged for Mr. and Mrs. Hough and the teachers. The Board of Directors had taken possession of the School Building while the teachers were enjoying an auto ride. When they returned they were taken to the school house, and in the large room of the Domestic Science Department an elegant banquet was awaiting them.

The surprise was complete. The clams were just ready to serve, having been prepared by the experienced hand of Director Slocum. About thirty invited guests were present. After recovering from the surprise, the teachers showed their appreciation, for they had been given a longer ride than they expected, and had found a hearty appetite in the bracing air of the evening.

After the banquet the evening was spent in conversation and games. All report a very pleasant evening. Credit is due to Messdames Beach, Slocum, Evans, Hill and Johnson, for the abundance of good things to eat.
