Oil and Gas Investigation in Western Oregon Nearly Completed.

A geologic examination of Western Oregon to determine the possible occurrence of commercial oil and gas has been one of the major activities of the Oregon Bureau of Mines and Geology during the past six months. This investigation has been conducted in exactly the same manner as the big producing oil companies carry on such work. The firm of Harrison and Eaton of Denver and Fort Worth, oil geologists, are conducting the investigation. The field work, therefore, has been handled by petroleum geologists who have had experience in the oil regions of California, Wyoming, Texas, and other producing districts of this and other countries.

In order to determine the character and structure of the various rocks that underlie Western Oregon and upon which the occurrence and preservation of oil and gas depend, a series of east and west cross sections of the Great Range and interior valleys were studied and carefully measured. To do this, advantage was taken of the numerous deep cut river canyons, for example, the Siuslaw, Yaquina, Umpqua, and the lower Columbia and upper Willamette rivers, where thousands of feet of thickness of the rocks may be seen in many places.

The Bureau made a special effort to get all possible information as to "oil indications" or "oil seeps" throughout the state. Reported localities were examined and, where necessary, tests made to prove or disprove the presence of oil.

The work included a careful study of the composition of the rock layers and sampling and testing of all of the more promising looking formations. In general, beds of shale that contain remains of animal or vegetable life are favorable to oil formation, and some shales were observed in which oil is actually being formed. A region can become a commercial producer of oil, however, only where the rock structure is such that the oil formed can accumulate in quantity in porous beds beneath the crests of folds or domes where it becomes entrapped by water pressure.

The results of this survey are being prepared for publication at the earliest possible date.

A study of the oil situation in Eastern Oregon has been carried on during the past season in cooperation with the United States Geological Survey. Dr. J. P. Buwalda of Yale University, who had charge of the field work, is preparing a report for early publication.
