IRRIGATION OF THE WEST RINGS CASH REGISTERS OF EAST
Idaho's Governor Asserts That Water, In the Right Place, Spells Untold Millions for U. S.

Points Out Immediate Direct Benefit to Eastern States Through the Prosperity of West
By D. W. DAVIS,
Governor of Idaho and President Western States Reclamation Association.

EDITOR'S NOTE—For snappy diction, for clear reasoning and general interest the following article by Governor D. W. Davis of Idaho is worthy the consideration of the most busy of men. Those whose seeking a better economic condition for the nation have suffered many suggestions, wise and otherwise, but Governor Davis, writing from a unique perspective gives one of the most intriguing of suggestions.

What has primarily lured the men to the West? What has been the guiding desire in the hearts and minds of those who set their faces toward the Pacific? Gold—the shining and precious metal, to be dug from the mountains or panned in the streams. Millions of it have been found. But its value has not compared with the value of the homes which have been established by these pioneers and those who have followed them.

These are permanent investments. In addition, many more millions have been produced from the soil than from mines in the west. And millions of acres still await the magic hand of enterprise, when water is through irrigation ditches which will course through irrigation. This is a proven fact. Where do these millions of dollars go? Into the channels of trade, into the world of commerce. Here is a concrete example. A man has been a renter in a humid section. He has created the average wealth possible on an acre of humid land. The profit is small—he divides even that. The government by impounding water makes it possible for him to take a farm under government project. This farm produces, according to statistics, twice the wealth his rented farm produced. Producing twice the wealth, he is twice as good a customer of the eastern or central state manufacturer and jobber he was in his old environment.

OUR MODERN FARMER.
Step in the home of a man who has fully developed his government farm. There you will find all of the common varieties of nationally advertised goods. He has a piano, a phonograph, a kitchen cabinet. He buys an automobile made in Detroit, or Cleveland, or Indianapolis, or Buicks made in Akron, farm implements made in Moline, a separator made in Waterloo. His family wears eastern-made clothes. His purchasing power has been enlarged with its opportunities.

It is a most interesting study to come in contact with the irrigation farmer. Go back into his life and note what he has been able to do since the government gave him his opportunity to create wealth. He assumes a greater share of tax because of his accumulation of wealth. A great majority of these men have paid but small tax shares on personal property before they wended their way westward into the land of opportunity. They now own land.

The manufacturer of the eastern and central states as well as the jobber who cannot see the active interest which the development of the west has upon his business is blind to his opportunity. His additional receipts through reclamation of land by the government are truly enormous. These receipts should be multiplied by ten in 25 years. There is not a sales manager nor executive head of any business in all that eastern territory but who would startle himself by thinking of the possibilities lying before him for an increase in his buying public and its ability to pay.

WAITING FOR WATER.
A trifle less than two million acres have been reclaimed by the government. There the twenty millions which could be placed under water. To accomplish this a system of finance has been worked out in the McNary-Smith bill now before congress which an appropriation of $350,000,000, the payment of which would cover a number of years, could be made to involve into an expenditure of a century, without adding to the investment.

The plan we have worked out for financing is not in its proper sense an appropriation by the government, for every cent that is used is paid back to the government. While the money is in use the government draws more interest from it than it must pay out. It is good statesmanship to provide for the future of agriculture in this country. It is good statesmanship for different sections of the country to join in building other sections. It greases the wheels of commerce, it increases per capita wealth, it encourages opportunity.

As these lands are developed they will furnish thousands of homes to enterprising citizens who have not before had an opportunity to become producers of wealth except in a non-usual way. Towns will grow, railroads be built, enterprises flourish, mines be opened, countless markets made. The selfish argument is made sometimes that the development of these new lands will reduce the value of land in the humid districts; that the production from the soil thus reclaimed would reduce the price of the products. Nothing could be farther from truth. Over-production is not a possibility. No less an authority than Dr. Ball said, before the Agricultural Conference:
"The peak of agricultural production per capita was reached in 1898, nearly a quarter of a century ago. Agricultural production almost kept pace with population for some little time after that date, but in the last decade it has been steadily and ever more rapidly falling. * * * No wonder that when the Secretary of Agriculture stated that the United States produced 25 per cent of the wheat, 60 per cent of the cotton, and 75 per cent of the corn of the world, with only one-sixth the population, the nation should feel it was on a firm foundation and its future prosperity assured."

A BALANCE LACKING.
In the mean time, standing still as an agricultural producing nation for a decade, our population has increased fourteen per cent. Dr. Ball further says:
"Whatever does this mean to the nation? It means a reorganization of our entire national life. It means that the farmer's interest in foreign markets will have disappeared. It means that the price of wheat in Chicago will be the price of wheat in Liverpool, plus the cost of moving it from Liverpool to Chicago, where now the price in Chicago is the price in Liverpool less the cost of moving it there."

What little opposition one hears seems to be centered in what is known as the corn belt. This corn belt section is standing in its own light. Much of the country's stock is finished with corn. If the west did not produce feeder stock, Iowa, Illinois, Missouri, and the other corn belt states would find a greatly reduced market for this crop. The crop in the irrigated section most responsible for the development of livestock and the production of a finished market in the central states is alfalfa. We feed, but do not ship, alfalfa in quantities. The United States is a big importer of wool. Alfalfa is raised in irrigated sections to feed to sheep in winter. In summer they are fed on the forest reserves. Millions of acres of forest reserve would be used as a wealth producer if we did not have alfalfa to feed in winter. We raise sugar. The country is a big sugar importer. There is not a single crop but wheat which could even remotely be considered competition. Let the statistician inform you that the production is so infinitesimal in the world's supply as to make no impression. We are fast, indeed, coming to special crops, because our remoteness from market eats up the profits in staples and will not bear the cost of production. In one irrigated section of the West, they are raising long staple cotton produced nowhere else in the United States. The fruits raised in the West are bringing comfort and pleasure to the less fortunate sections of the country.

years ago where Twin Falls, Idaho, was a barren sage brush desert. This site of the town was sixty-four miles from a railroad. Last year the Twin Falls section sent thirty-six million dollars out of Idaho to purchase goods. I know personally hundreds of farmers in Idaho who had a hand in spending that thirty-six million, and I do not know one who had as much to spend in his old environment.

Periodicals are flooded with suggestions which would open up foreign trade. We hear much of South America. Our political officers are deeply interested in this foreign trade, and most big businesses have departments with many employees working on trade extension. Yet the irrigated states of the West last year bought more than all South America purchased from our manufacturers and jobbers. No other country, with the possible exception of Great Britain, begins to form the market the irrigated West does. If I ran a big business, I would consider the reclamation of the West as important a division of my sales development as foreign trade.

If we do not develop our lands to produce food, and continually drop to a lower scale as a food-producing nation, every one of our cities in the East will lose in population in comparison with what they might be if we would produce more farm products.

Morrow Man High
Harold Ahalt, of Morrow county, was high man for the month in the number of predatory animals killed, according to the report recently sent out by Stanley G. Jewett, of the department of biological survey. He killed 10 adult coyotes and 41 pups.

Three hundred and eight unborn predatory animals were killed altogether. Poisoning, shooting and trapping were the methods used by the hunters.—Pendleton Tribune.

Today we have but ten per cent of the possible territory irrigable by the government in cultivation. Yet if we had all of it we would not add as much as the farm area of the state of Indiana to the total agricultural area of the United States. At the same time, practically every dollar of production in this highly productive country would go back to the east for cash purchases, making one of the most stable markets in the world. While we would add no more than the agricultural area of Indiana to the farm stretches of the Union, yet there would be supported as great a population as three times as within the state of Indiana.

Let us claim this development will ring the cash registers of the East. Better say which we know it. Fifteen
