

FARM POINTERS

Protecting of the bees and eggs from the direct rays of the sun during the hottest part of the day should decrease the tendency to swarm. One way made of a wire thickness of lumber, if unprotected, may cause great discomfort to the bees. To prevent this, shade boards large enough to project beyond the edge of the hive may be used over the covers—O. A. C. Extension service.

Large extrusions to bees add to the comfort of bees in warm weather and reduce their tendency to swarm. Bees need much more ventilation during the honey flow when they are more active than at other times—O. A. C. Extension service.

There are four soil fertility experiment fields on different types of hill lands, including from 12 to 30 plots each, and located near North Albany, Corbett, Shaw and Astoria. Yields from these fields show a greater increase in crops from application of sulphur than from application of any phosphate, even though acid phosphate contains some gypsum, which carries a little available sulphur. Nitrogen has increased yields on non-leguminous sod and potash has caused little increase. Good increases have been secured from lime and from lime when used in conjunction with phosphate or phosphate and manure—O. A. C. Experiment Station.

Potato growers can protect their crops against blight in the night districts by dusting the plants at intervals with copper-lime dust or by spraying with Bordeaux mixture. Write to the Oregon Agricultural College experiment station, Corvallis, for full particulars.

HONEY PHILOSOPHY FOR 1923. ONCE there was a wise boy. He was wise, not foolish, because he bought a car, and wiser still because he used it. Whenever he got into a jam he'd go into the garage and take a long look at that fiver. And his eyes would fix themselves on the check-ashbers. He'd paid about $20 for them. When he first drove the car he found out he'd better dodge the bumps and soften those he couldn't dodge.

Nowadays he sees that life is just a village roadway calling for improvements, and not a very long roadway either. A little cautious driving and we can reach the end without much shaking up. Then we can go into neutral without worrying.

Miss Dorothy Hill departed for Portland Saturday and will visit with relatives in that city for some time.
