Meantime, while Ruth had not seen water, she fancied she had heard the rushing current. It puzzled the girl. Was the water—to irrigate Haunted Valley—the key to all the mystery, she wondered. Her thoughts were put to rout by the sudden appearance of Craig on horseback. Since the exciting event of the night before a warm friend-ship had sprung up between the two young people. Ruth liked Eugene Craig immensely, and he had promised to assist her in clearing up the mystery.

"Possibly you're right," Mallinson nawered, and turning to his control an, he added, "Don't harm the ri, but if Craig enters the valley t him have it." man in the control room looked into his mirror device—and saw that Craig was in the valley. Remembering his orders he rushed to a corner of the room, glanced at the section chart and pulled a lever. Craig and Dinny suddenly felt themselves falling through the earth.

Ruth Ranger, horrified, and scarcely believing her eyes, seized her lariat from the ponimel of her saddle, leaped from her horse and rushed toward the spot. Before the girl could stop herself, she plunged through the pitfall and dropped into an inderground stream that whirled along dangerously.

"You know," she began after her greeting, "there isn't a drop of water in the valley, and yet I am sure I heard a running stream."

Craig smiled. "I can show you something that may interest you, he said. "Just follow me."

Together they leaped the fence and rode toward the grotto. Here they found Dinny, who was refreshing himself from the cool waters of the spring that bubbled.

Craig and his young friend were helpless in the whirlpool. The strong current flung them downstream violently and crashed them against the rocks on the sides. Craig managed to seize Dinny and was about to push him to a ledge for safety when he saw with horror that Ruth had been plunged into the whirlpool also. He left Dinny and attempted to reach the girl, but she was spir ning around neiplessly and violently and crashed them against the rocks on the sides.
