Dried beans and peas held over for food or seed should be fumigated before permanent storage to prevent weevil infestation, says Don C. Mote, entomologist of the Oregon Experiment Station.

The material to be fumigated should be put in gas-proof containers and treated with carbon bisulfide. This material is a liquid. It is placed in a shallow tray which is placed on top of the seed. The container is then covered tightly, and the gas allowed to act 24 to 36 hours. The liquid evaporates, and the gas being heavier than air, settles down through a five gallon container. Carbon bisulfide is very inflammable and explosive in both the liquid and gaseous form, hence all lights, sparks or flames must be kept away from it, and it should not be used in a heated room. The gas is not effective below 60 degrees F. and the best temperature is 75 degrees F. After fumigation the seed should be examined occasionally for live weevils and if any are found, a second or third fumigation may be necessary.

For small amounts of material which are not to be used for seed, the pest may be controlled by heat. Put the material in a shallow baking pan and place in the oven. To regulate the temperature, a pan of water may be placed in the oven which should not reach the boiling point. One hour of this treatment kills all stages of insects causing the trouble.

High temperatures will kill the germinating power of seeds, so carbon bisulfide is best used for seeds intended for planting and is more applicable to large quantities.

CARD OF THANKS. We desire to take this moment of thanking our neighbors and all the friends who came out from Heppner to assist us in fighting the fire at our place last Friday. Your prompt response to the call for aid, and the hard work done after arriving at the scene of the fire were the means of saving a lot of valuable property, and we sincerely appreciate it. MR. and MRS. NELS JUSTUS.
