

Early Indian War History Graphically Told

Seized by the Oregon fever, he joined a band of soldiers that were leaving for Oregon in 1844 and was chosen as captain of the train. Arriving in the Willamette valley in the autumn of that year, he located a land claim on the Willamette, near Heppner, Oregon, he taking 200 acres and his wife the same, according to the practice at that time. As Colonel Gilliam was killed in the Indian war and thus not able to be present in person to hold his part of the claim, his family subsequently lost it.

account the Indians responsible for the terrible crime. At this point, the Peace Commission which had been appointed as a second thought, by the legislature, stepped in, bent upon a somewhat different course with the Indians. Gilliam was restrained from his natural inclination to force the fighting and shied under the delay. He could do nothing but wait until the Commission had an opportunity to treat the pacific measures it had in mind.

A council with the Indians was held but accomplished little. The Cayuses, though divided, but did not surrender the murderers or meet the other demands made upon them. Colonel Gilliam with a small force of 128 men started in pursuit. In a night march, he surprised some Indians in camp near the mouth of the Tumacum. The crafty savages, however, represented themselves to be friendly Walla Walla, and while he was investigating the truth of their statements they escaped across the Snake river. Returning from the scene, Gilliam's troops were attacked by about 400 Palouse Indians. A very sharp engagement took place for the possession of a furd on the Touchet river. Victory rested with the troops and the Palouse Indians were driven into the mountains. The command had been forced to abandon.

Upon the arrival at Wallatup, a conference of the officers was held. It was decided that little could be done without additional men and more arms. Accordingly, on the 20th of March, the companies of Captain McKay and Maxson, a force of about 160 men, were dispatched to The Dalles for supplies. With this detachment went Colonel Gilliam on his way back to Walla Walla, Washington. The following June special services were held in his honor by the Masonic fraternity of Oregon. This was, so far as known, the first regular Masonic funeral service in the state.
