Just Another Form of Taxation.

THE MANUFACTURER. AUTOMOBILES had been regulated and legislated in about all the ways possible until some one suggested the idea of "compulsory automobile insurance."

Instantly a limitless field was opened for the agitator, professional politician and those socialistically inclined.

If this idea could be put over on the automobile it could then be fastened on to any other business or industry.

One who examines the average automobile damage claim is apt to have grave doubts as to whether an insurance policy is a deterrent of recklessness.

There is every reason to believe that such a system would encourage rather than discourage carelessness.

The argument is made that such insurance would protect the "widow and orphan."

If such insurance tended to increase carelessness and injuries it would be poor protection.

The whole proposal is just another plan to launch the state in the insurance business after making a new form of taxation compulsory.
