It was necessary to unhook the horses and hitch them onto the Bull wheel, reversing the machine before he could get his thumb out. Dr. Walker dressed the wound.

City Streets vs Country Roads

Anybody who has travelled in an automobile has seen many miles of poor paving on country highways. This is largely due to the fact that the lessons learned by the cities in street paving have in many instances not been applied to the country roads. Hence the taxpayer pays twice for learning the same lesson.

Seldom do you see a rigid, non-shock absorbing type of pavement on a heavily travelled city street. Instead you find a resilient type of pavement capable of withstanding traffic impact.

It must be water tight to keep the subgrade dry. Commenting on 775,000 square yards of this type of pavement laid in Portland, Oregon, since 1911, the Commission of Public works in a recent published letter, said:

"The maintenance of these pavements has been negligible, requiring slight repairs along car tracks or for service cuts. Many of these streets carry very heavy traffic, yet they are in a very satisfactory condition and give every indication of good service in years to come."

Hundreds of miles of Oregon highways have been laid in a manner similar to Portland streets and they have required little or no maintenance. With such object lessons to go by all over the country, it is astonishing to see tax money wasted in experimental construction of various kinds on county and state roads.—The Manufacturer.
