Encouraging Building Construction

Lumber is the one great building material that has made possible "home ownership" for the average American citizen.

In order to extend its markets and encourage the building of homes, the lumber industry as a whole has been doing a great deal of constructive work to show builders how to build safe chimneys, flues and fireplaces and how to get the greatest advantages from frame construction as compared with other materials.

The National Lumber Manufacturer's Association, which represents the principal lumber producing organizations of the United States, has been issuing many valuable pamphlets and booklets showing how fire prevention may be secured through proper use of wood in building construction.

Prospective builders can get much valuable information along these lines from local lumber organizations which would be of benefit to them through better methods of construction and help stabilize the great employing lumber industry as a result of adopting building standards which eliminate fire hazards and encourage the use of our great national building material.

Cheaper to paint than to repair

THERE'S no denying the fact. Take a look at some of the homes and buildings in your locality and you'll admit that repair costs would be far greater than the cost of many coats of paint.

Paint saves material and labor bills. Paint saves worry.

It's cheaper to paint than to repair.

Rasmussen Pure Paint gives you the fullest surface protection. We have it, and other Rasmussen products, too.
