COOLIDGE FAVORS REFUND OF TAXES

10 to 12 Per Cent Return on This Year's Income Tax Thought Possible.

Washington, D. C. — The sudden declaration of President Coolidge for a refund of 10 or 12 per cent of this year's income taxes caused a scratching of heads both at the treasury and at the capitol.

Secretary Mellon proposed after a conference with President Coolidge that the projected income tax refund be accomplished through a credit to the taxpayer on his first two installments of income taxes to be paid next year.

The secretary believes the credit could be made as high as 12 1/2 per cent of next year's taxes. While the president had suggested a straightout refund on taxes paid this year, the secretary held that plan too costly from an administrative standpoint. Mr. Coolidge accepted the Mellon idea.

Generally, in republican and democratic circles alike, the move was taken to mean that the session of congress beginning one month from now would have the issue thrust upon it from opposing camps—the democrats holding to their demand for straight-out tax reduction and the president's followers countering with the plan for rebates.

About 3,000,000 individuals and corporations would benefit by the program and it was estimated that if immediate refunds were ordered by congress, rather than credit on next year's taxes, it would cost much in routine expenses to return $200,000,000 to the taxpayers.

Under the program for a 10 per cent refund, the average taxpayers would get little more than $1. Those with taxable incomes of less than $5,000 would get little more than 75 cents each.

ALONG LIFE'S TRAIL

MONEY MAD

A RECENT magazine writer explores the lack of idealism among our educated young people today, and mourns the fact that even in colleges the main idea of youth seems to be how most easily to make money. It is not a new situation. Two thousand years ago the Great Teacher was asking young people not unlike those we are familiar with today, "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? They were money mad then quite as much as they are today, no doubt. The love of money is not a new passion.

Thoreau, when I was young, was complaining: "I cannot buy a book any more to write my thoughts in. They are all rufed for dollars and cents." It was to get away from this mad race for money, to have such leisure as he wanted to read and write and to live his own life that he built his cabin and isolated himself at Walden. Money has always attracted young people and old, too, for that matter, and possibly it did fifty or two thousand years ago.

The rapid advancement, the job that pays the largest salary, the opportunity for accumulating wealth—these are the things that attract young people and old. You put a proposition before a person and the first thing he is likely to ask is, "How much is there in it for me?" And yet there are some things worth more than money.

A friend of mine who has a comfortable salary, though he will never be rich, was last year offered two or three times his present income to take a new position in an entirely different situation. He is a hard student who likes the leisure which teaching gives him, and who likes the friends who, through the years he has lived in his present position, he has gathered about him. He never really seriously considered the new position.

"I would rather have the sympathetic and refined friends whom I have made during the last ten years," he said to me, "I would rather have the leisure to read the books which I enjoy or to write other books, than all the money in the world."

Youth is quite likely to feel that money will buy anything, and that the sooner they get hold of it, the better. But love and friends and opportunity to do our work are worth more even than money.

A Merry Christmas To All.

This is the month when the spirit of Christmastide holds sway, when adoring age bows its head in love and reverence of the glorious miracle of youth.

This is the annual festival and feast of little children.

Happily, hopefully we have marched thru the year,  striving ever forward towards the Mount of Success from which we can survey a rich promise OF PROSPERITY AHEAD.

Let age join with youth in commemorating the birth of Him who gave to age its sublimest promise and to youth its noblest inspirations.

Once again MERRY CHRISTMAS.
