Historic Timber

historic relics.

The truss is one of those removed from the roof of the White House in the renovation of the mansion now nearing completion. After literally holding the roof over the heads of presidents of the United States for the last 112 years, these trusses are in excellent condition as far as the wood is concerned and a half section of one will be preserved not only for its historical association but as an example of the remarkable durability of wood. Twenty six presidents have lived in the White House since the trusses were put in place.

In 1814, after the Battle of Bladensburg, the British soldiers with their flaming torches, came thronging up Pennsylvania Ave. and burned the White House, the fire destroyed the interior and seriously damaged some of the masonry. President Madison and his famous wife, Dolly, made a dramatic departure from the Executive Mansion, fleeing up Pennsylvania Avenue just ahead of the British.

Reconstruction was begun shortly after the fire, the new roof being held in place by sturdy wood trusses. Today these trusses with their timbers in almost as good condition as when they were cut 112 years ago, are interesting as examples of early workmanship. The timbers, all hand sawn, are held together not only by mortising, but with dowels and heavy wrought iron straps pounded out by hand.

When the old roof was removed it was found that there was practically no deterioration of material in any vital place in the massive main roof timber truss and only the ends of the timbers formerly the trusses over the north portico were damaged by powder post beetles. Builder of a century ago were not familiar with the use of preservatives to lengthen the life of the exposed wood and did not treat the material as would the builders of today.

To know one person who is also truly to be trusted will do more for a man's moral nature—yes, and even his spiritual nature—than all the sermons he ever heard or can hear.—George MacDonald.
