Tiger China's King of Beasts
To the Chinese the tiger, not the lion, is the king of beasts. From childhood they are taught to fear the tiger, and he is made the bugaboo to frighten youngsters. If they are naughty they are told that the "tao-hu" (tiger) will catch them. Paper tigers are pasted over doors in China, so that the evil spirits, seeing the beast, will flee away.

The Chinese have great faith in tiger bones, claws and sinews as medicine. Since the tiger is so strong, they say, medicine made of him must make one strong. Travelling medicine men with tiger skins stretched on their poles as signboards rarely wait long for purchasers of their wares.—New York Times.

Franklin's Precocity
It was in 1772 that Benjamin Franklin tried his hand at Journalism for the first time, writes Nathan G. Goodman in the Baltimore Sun. Without their being identified he slipped articles into the Courant under the name of "Mrs. Silence Dogood." Parading behind the mask of a shrewd middle-aged widow this sixteen-year-old boy carried on a moral and intellectual crusade, including an attack on "scolars" at Harvard college. Already Franklin knew how to mix light, amusing observations in serious discussions without falling into burlesque, and he avoided bitterness.

Old, but Apt Phrase
Few phrases are more apt than "All his geese are swans," which has come down to us through more than 300 years, and which we understand to be practically synonymous with the line "He is prone to exaggerate." Like so many other idioms now a solid part of our daily conversation, this one was originally found in a book now considered a classic. It was first used in none other than the famous "Anatomy of Melancholia," by Robert Burton, over three centuries ago.—Kansas City Times.

Water Glass Eggs
According to the findings of the home economics students at the Wisconsin college of agriculture, eggs stored in water glass are as rich in vitamins as fresh eggs.

Mr. and Mrs. Paul Balsiger and Mrs. S. E. Moore motored to Portland Saturday, returning Monday. Alfree Balsiger made the trip with to the city with them, where he goes to resume his school work for the year.
