

Welding of East and West in 'Iron Horse'

The story of the wires and the rails which first linked the west with the east, has been recorded on the screen for the first time. Described by Robert Louis Stevenson as a greater achievement in the world's history than the building of Troy, this tremendous theme furnishes the basis for "The Iron Horse," the William Fox super production at the Star theater Sunday and Monday.

Names which have come down in history and will go on forever, appear in the cast. Lincoln, Grant, Dodge,

Buffalo Bill Cody, Wild Bill Hickok and Bat Masterson are just a few of them. The picture is not a melodrama, but a spectacular cinema record of the linking of America, based on historical records.

When President Lincoln signed the Pacific Railroad Act on July 1, 1862, the bill included the provision that a telegraph system must accompany the rails, thus connecting the east and west by wire and rail. It was the first means of communication other than stage coach and pony express. Lincoln at his time was striving to unite the north and south, but he did not abandon one great dream for the other. He was assassinated before his dream could be realized.

The dramatic story has been made into a powerful picture, with George

O'Brien, J. Farrell MacDonald and Madge Bellamy in the leading roles. John Ford, the director, used a regiment of cavalry and four tribes of Indians to add to the color. An enormous cast of capable artists supports the principals.
