In doing this it has virtually staked its good reputation as a clean newspaper on the judgment of its editors, a judgment that we believe is sound in this instance, as it has proved to be divers times in the

Every newspaper editor is human. It is impossible for any human being to be absolutely impartial in anything, especially anything political. Every newspaper editor has his personal choice of candidates, and all are working to have their choice given favorable consideration by the electorate. Most of them endeavor to shape the minds of their readers in this respect in some way through the columns of their papers, though few have the nerve to take the of the state as the party candidate

The Oregonian has taken a step, which, if followed by every newspaper in the state, would go a long way toward lifting the stigma off state politics that now surrounds it. Newspaper readers in general today place little faith in anything of a political nature that appears in the newspapers, looking upon it mostly as so much propaganda. If they knew exactly where every newspaper stands with regard to political candidates and political issues they would then be able to gauge the value of items appearing in the news columns. Not only would this help in dispelling the clouds surrounding state politics, but it would go a long way toward increasing public confidence in their organs of speech, that lamentably has been slowly slipping away in the last few decades.

It is high time newspaperdom were able to see beyond the immediate penny fogging its vision
