Old and New West Join in Eugene Celebration

EUGENE, ORE.—The spirit of the old West will again be revived when the "Trail to Rail" celebration, marking the completion of the Southern Pacific's new Cascade line between San Francisco and Portland via Klamath Falls and Eugene, will be staged here August 19 and 20.

State, county and city officials together with representatives of the Southern Pacific and the Interstate Commerce Commission will participate in the two-day celebration which is expected to become the most elaborate affair ever produced in Oregon.

A pageant "Klatawa," depicting the evolution of travel from the early days of the Indians to the present time, has been written for the celebration by Prof. W. P. G. Thatcher, of the University of Oregon. More than 2000 people will participate in the production.

Indians, cowboys, pioneer residents, lumberjacks, and all types of transportation from Indian "pole drags" to the modern locomotive and airplane, will participate in the picturesque parade which features the fete.

Exra Meeker, famous Oregon Trail pioneer, will have a leading part in the historical pageant. Captain O. C. Applegate and Cal Young, pioneer residents of Klamath Falls and Eugene, will also have leading roles.

BRITISH FAIR PLAY AND THE WAR DEBT

(Oregonian.)

The verbal contribution of the British foreign secretary to discussion of the war debt was manifestly spoken with a double tongue. It is difficult for Americans to read it with patience when they comprehend that beneath its carefully chosen phrases, its dignified professions of high integrity, runs the same sneer which heretofore has been more openly indulged. Let us concede that it is a valuable acquisition to diplomatic literature, since it succeeds in saying much that it purports to deny and even to rebuke. By implication, ever so carefully suggested and left to burgeo in the thought of Sir Austen's auditors and readers, the United States still is represented as a miserable skinflint. Let us see if some few of the remarks of the foreign secretary do not lead adroitly to such conclusions. "We borrowed money from the United States for the purpose of a war in which they and we were engaged," he observed. And again, "You must not ask us to say, and other people must not ask us to say, that this (payment of the war debt to the United States) was the best solution that might be arrived at in the interests of the world at large." And further, "We would have been prepared, and gladly prepared, to wipe the slate clean of all these obligations among the allied and associated powers as being part of our contribution to the great cause in which we were all engaged." Then, dryly, "That solution did not commend itself." But the master stroke, the most insinuating incitement to ill will, was this tribute to the magnanimity and honor of Great Britain: "We have since then adopted as our policy that from our debtors we will ask only so much as will meet the payments which we have to meet ourselves." Impeccable, candid, upright Britain, scornful the repudiation of its war debt, but urging with the same tongue and in the same breath an increased antipathy toward the United States!

Sir Austen bids the late allies of Great Britain, who are in her debt, as they are in ours, consider that such payments as they make to her are wrung from them by a reluctant friend from the satisfaction of an unnatural and callous creditor. Thus we are condemned not alone for the endeavor to collect some minor portion of the direct indebtedness of France, but we are equally condemned for the collection by Great Britain of France's debt to her! But for this American avarice, said Sir Austen in not as an ally, the might of American arms was thrust. And we think that this lapsus linguae of the British foreign secretary, for such it must have been, effectually disposes of the selfish European contention that the war was ours from the first, and that the allies and America were co-partners therein.

The British foreign secretary talks at great length of the good faith of Great Britain and of her determination to pay her debts. He speaks of the British aversion for whining and he extols the immemorial British honor. Does not all this protestation of lofty motive connote the extreme reluctance of the debtor, and is it not threatened with a whine to the last syllable? Good faith? They sully the term who employ it in open or covert disparage of the nation that aided them when their need was dire, and which might—for all that may be said to the contrary—have let the continent of Europe stew in its own vital juices. They say that a triumphant Germany would have attacked America with armed, exultant forces. Possibly. This much is certain, however: our triumphant associates in the last war have surely attacked us with weapons of slander and malice. If Europe were to call again, terribly in her fright and agony, this nation might consider well the record that now is being written. And then Why, then, in all likelihood, we would gird ourselves and go to the rescue—for it is by such impulses that the American governs his conduct.

Mont Bundy was in the city from his north-end ranch Saturday. Down that way the threshing is completed, the grain all delivered at the warehouses in Lexington, the most of it sold and the money spent, so Mr. Bundy states, and the farmers are now ready to begin fall operations as soon as a good rain or two comes along.
