

NEW U. OF O. HEAD SALUTES FRESHMEN

Dr. Hall Compares Own Situation With That of Entering Students.

University of Oregon, Eugene, Sept. 8.—(Special).—As a freshman at the university, Dr. Arnold Bennett Hall, the new president, issued a message today to the hundreds of undergraduate freshmen who will register this fall, asking them to share in the noble ideals built into the institution by the late President P. L. Campbell.

The message, which is printed in the student handbook issued today and which is President Hall's first public pronouncement, follows:

"May I extend to the students of Oregon a sincere and cordial welcome at the beginning of the university's second half-century of progress and achievement. And may I give a particularly personal welcome to those who come to us for the first time. For I, too, am a freshman at Oregon. I, too, must learn to find my way around among faces that are strange and with duties that are new. I, too, am undertaking a new venture and am at the beginning of a new epoch in my life.

"As I have looked ahead to the day when I would first take up my duties on the campus I have been looking for some chart by which my efforts might be guided. I have sought some established landmarks that might keep me headed towards the onward course and save me from futile wanderings and confusion in the midst of so much that is strange and unfamiliar. And I think I have found a landmark that will be a lamp unto my feet and a light unto my path. I refer to the noble heritage of ideals that has been built into the very warp and woof of Oregon by my distinguished predecessor—your former president—and his associates. These ideals found constant and intelligent expression not only in noble words but in a victorious life of many deeds. As sincerely as I know how I invite the students of Oregon to share with me the inspiration and the wisdom of this common heritage.

"As I have tried from afar to picture President Campbell's life of service to the commonwealth, I thought I divined three outstanding ideals that I hope we all can serve. In the first place there was his nobility of purpose. His soul never seemed to harbor a thought that was ignoble or unworthy. One reads his utterances and his career with the deepening conviction that the joy of useful living was never dimmed by selfish intrigue and petty jealousy. The second qualification that seems to have impressed his personality upon the university was his intellectual integrity. He loved the truth. He hated sham. He sought the public confidence, not by pretense but by service. One cannot think of him putting up a "front," or trying to "get by." Sincerity and genuineness were essential to his self-respect. He never bowed to the gods of cant and dogma. He never beguiled himself. He had the manly courage and the intellectual integrity to face the truth and to follow wherever it might lead. Finally he seems to have had a firm hold upon the spiritual realities of life. He had a clear understanding of the dynamic and ennobling qualities of spiritual understanding. He dealt with the things of the spirit with intelligence and reverence. It found expression in the breadth of his sympathies, in the almost infinite depths of his compassion, and in the sacrificial character of his service.

"It is to share with us this privilege that I eagerly welcome you. Let us joyously, sincerely, reverently, take up the task that he laid down. Let us see that the splendor of his work shall not be dimmed by ideals that are unworthy or conduct that is ignoble. To the altar of his memory let us bring rich gifts of consecration to noble aims and of devotion to high ideals. Let us make Oregon the place that it ought to be; rich in noble traditions; reverent and courageous in the quest of truth; manly, wholesome and clean in its atmosphere; and generous, sympathetic and high minded in its ideals. And when your college days are over and you return to the communities from which you came, may you go enriched in spirit, strengthened in character and ideals, and disciplined in intellect, eager and competent to build into the life of the community and commonwealth nobler and better
