The Bond Election.

THE school bond election to provide funds for building the auditorium-gymnasium is called for Friday, March 18. There is no need to urge upon the voters of District No. One the importance of this proposal and the great need for the building that will result should the bond issue be authorized. Enough has already been said touching these points. The importance of the issue, however, should act as a stimulous to the voters and urge them to get out to If you want to see the bond issue prevail, come out and vote; if you are opposed to the placing of further indebtedness of this nature figures were busily moving among upon the district, come out and them, and the thin blue smoke of vote. Let the matter be settled definitely one way or the other, as whole prospect—they, the breakfast all such questions should be, smoke, the grazing animals, the stout There should be no indifference manifested.

Westward Ho!

My new boots were burning, my thigh was chafed raw from the swaying Colt, and my face and throat were parched with the dust, when I the polls and express their desires arrived at the encampment of Jenks' train. Some dozen white-topped wagons were standing grouped in a circle and their fires was a welcoming signal.

I marked women and children. The vehicles, a line of washed clothingwas homey. Jenks himself came out o meet me

"Glad to meet you, stranger," he acknowledged. "Brenkfasted?" "Not yet, sir. I was anxious to reach the train."

"Nobody goes hungry from the Adams wagon, stranger," Captain Adams observed. He slightly raised his voice, peremptory, "Rach our guest some breakfast."

There were two women in view, busied with domestic cares. One was elderly, as far as might be judged by her somewhat slatternly figure.

The other promptly ladled food from a kettle to a platter, poured a tin cupful of coffee from the pot, and bore them to me; her eyes down, shy

"You are from the East, stranger?" he inquired. "Yes, sir. I arrived in Benton only "A Sodom," he growled harshly. "A tented sepulcher. And it will perish. I tell you, you do well to leave it, you do well to yoke yourself with the ap-pointed of this earth, rather than stay in that sin-pit of the eternally

"I agree with you, sir," said L. "I did not find Benton to be a pleasant place. But I had not known, when I started from Omaha."

"Possibly not," Adams assented. The devil is attentive; he is present , the stations, and he will ride in hose gilded palaces even to the Jor dan, but he shall not cross. In the name of the Lord we shall face him. What good there shall come, shall abide; but the evil shall wither. Not," he added, "that we stand against the railroad. It is needed, and we have petitioned without being heard. We are strong but isolated, we have goods Young has gone forth that a railroad we must have. Against the harpies the gambiers and all the Gentile vanities we will stand upon our own feet by the help of Almighty God."

At this juncture a tall double-joint-ed youth of about my age, carrying an ox goad in his band, strolled to us as if attracted by the harrangue. "My son Daniel," the captain in-troduced. "This stranger travels to Zion with us, Daniel."

The youth had the grip of a vise, and seemed to enjoy emphasizing it while cunningly watching my face. "Howdy," he drawled.

I left soon to join Jenks' wagon and as I passed Rachael, she glanced quickly up. I caught her eyes with a blush. She was indeed wholesome if not absolutely pretty.

"Wall, those Mormons are good providers," Jenks commented. "The, it share with you whatever they have for no pay, but if you rub 'em the wrong way or go to dickerin' with 'em they're closer'n the hide on a cold mule. You didn't make sheep's eyes at any of the women?

"However, I could not help but see that the captain's daughter is pleasing to look upon." "How? His daughter?"

"Miss Rachael." "Whoa, man! She's his wife, and not for Gentiles. They're both his wives; whether he has more in Utah I don't know. But you'd best let her alone. She's been j'ined to him." This took me all aback. He was world has sold itself to the devil."

We remained in silence for a moment while he waited, provocative, "Say, Mister," he blurted sudden-ly, "kin yu shoot?"
